In the spring of 1772, profiting by a pause in his literary labors, Buffon returned to Paris, and resumed in person the direction of the king's garden. The time was come when his talent for organization could be employed to the most lasting advantage. The vital movement had been steadily progressive, and the institution had outgrown its scope. A new constitution was imminent, and the presiding presence became indispensable. From this period dates the veritable development of the king's garden. Assured of the royal favor, and safe in popular esteem, Buffon found himself unlimited in means and uncontrolled in scheme. He purchased houses, land, collections. He pulled down, rebuilt, enlarged, reorganized. The king threw open to him the public treasury, and his signature passed current for uncounted sums. Of this princely credit Buffon made ample and unshrinking use, but at the same time he guarded vigilantly against unpractical and visionary projects. He was averse to needless prodigality, and a letter exists, by which, in terms not admitting of reply, he declines the proffered services of an architect of the period, whose plans he deemed to have been conceived with undue profuseness. An inquest, provoked some years later by his own act, declared his administration in all respects commendable, and his expenditure, above all, judicious. The king at the same time approved his redistribution of the classes, and his appointment of the supplementary professorships.

At about this date, a public homage was rendered him such as had never before, in France, been offered to any great man during his lifetime. His statue was erected at the cost of the state, and inaugurated with national solemnities. It was placed, where it still remains, in the scene of his devoted labors, and underneath was engraved the magnificent inscription:—

“MAJESTATI NATURE PAR INGENIUM.”

So signal a distinction was not of a nature to remain an event of mere local celebrity, and whilst acclaimed in France with undisputed approval, it was tastefully recognized as a merited and appropriate honor by the academies of London, Edinburgh, Berlin, Petersburg, Rome, Florence, Bologna, Philadelphia, Boston, and Geneva.

To this high testimony Louis XV. recorded unsolicited adhesion by a voluntary exercise of the royal prerogative. He erected into an hereditary comté, or earldom, the manor of Buffon-par-Montbard, and the fatal title of count became thenceforth the privilege forever of Buffon and his male successors. The letters patent bear date in 1773, and state expressly that a new dignity is created in favor of a titular of distinguished merit, “in order thereby to excite in other breasts the noble emulation which produces honorable and great qualities.”

Meanwhile the king's garden had undergone complete transformation. A spacious amphitheatre had been opened for the convenience of public instruction. The school of botany had been refounded, receptacles had been provided for the plants of all climates, and a vast accession made to the scientific treasures of the museum. Rich presents continued to arrive from all points of the globe; associations vied with each other in the choiceness of specimens, destined to fix the attention of “the great painter of nature”; and such indeed was the fascination of his influence, that not only were the collections enriched by the contributions of missionaries concealed in China at the risk of their lives, but cases addressed to Buffon, and seized at sea by buccanniers and pirates, were respected from the address they bore, and forwarded unopened to their sacred destination.

Buffon was now engaged upon the “History of the Minerals,” a subject grateful to his genius, as enforcing the profoundest contemplation, and leading necessarily to extended views. It reconducted him, he writes, after thirty years of meditation, to the scene of his early labors in the interior of the earth. His later thoughts upon the same subject, matured by long reflection and refined by incessant testing, express the impartial judgment of a mind applied with unswerving probity to the research of truth. The “History of the Minerals,” which appeared as a supplement to his other works, contained also the “Epochs of Nature,” which Flourens describes as “the most profound and perfect of the works of Buffon: a sort of divination vouchsafed to the old age of a sincere philosopher.” At the appearance of this last volume the enthusiasm became general. All Europe applauded simultaneously. Kings mingled their congratulations with those of poets and philosophers. Voltaire recalled his satire, and blushed; whilst from Russia rose a shout of exultation, as Catherine read aloud to her assembled court, that the North was the scene of Nature's virgin struggles, the birthplace and cradle of her first and grandest productions.

The Empress Catherine had been no inactive or indifferent spectator of the progress of the Parisian museum. She had contributed handsomely both to the mineral and zoological departments, and she had already initiated at St. Petersburg a rival institution. She aspired longingly, for her own empire, to the enduring distinctions of science and letters, and she envied France far less her martial heroes than her Voltaires, her Diderots, and d'Alemberts. Her coaxing invitation to Buffon, to pass over into that North, which his genius had divined and his authority justified, her caressing promise to guard him folded in the sables of Siberia, are models of queenly condescension and conscious deference to intellectual worth. The letter came accompanied by a present of furs of the intrinsic value of a thousand pounds sterling. Buffon felt half disposed to go, but, on reflection, he considers himself too old,—he was then in his seventy-fifth year,—and he decides on sending his son instead. The empress accepts the substitution, but only on condition that the son bring with him his father's bust; and she again accompanies her letter with a costly gift, consisting this time of native silver from the Oural Mountains.

The young Buffon, then an officer in the Guards, was received with all honor at the Court of St. Petersburg. The empress herself took from him his father's bust and conveyed it to its destination at the Hermitage, where with her own hands she placed on its head a crown of laurels. On his return to France, after a visit to the King of Prussia at Potsdam, he found his father engaged upon a further supplementary volume of the “Natural History,” and from that time until almost the moment of his death, the veteran continued to write on with undimmed and unabated ardor. On his eightieth birthday he exclaimed to his old and attached friend, the Father Ignatius, “I have passed fifty years of my life at the writing-desk ; I have had a safe existence. I pray that my son may be constantly occupied with a great subject."

The few anxieties of his life had sole reference to the future of his only son. One cross had occurred which he was unable entirely to forget. During the one only serious malady of his life, which attacked him in his sixty-fourth year, and which well-nigh terminated fatally, the Count d'Angeviller, then tutor to the dauphin, made use of his credit at court to secure in his own behalf the reversion of the intendency of the king's garden. For some time the arrangement was kept secret, but it transpired on Buffon's recovery, and was taken much amiss by the public, who well knew that it was the dearest wish of the old naturalist's heart to be succeeded in his office by his son. Buffon himself made no complaint, but was unable to disguise his disappointment. Some years later, by means of a delicate negotiation, he privately offered the count a large sum of money to renounce his right. But it was then too late. D'Angeviller, uneasy in his mind, and possibly foreboding annoyance, had dexterously effaced his personality by effecting a commutation with his brother, for the reversion of a seigneurial patronage. This latter complication had wearied his protectress at court, Madame de Pompadour, and he shrunk from returning singly to the charge. The intrigue, however, profited but little to the two d'Angevillers. During the sixteen years that remained of Buffon's existence, the king's garden was a subject ever avoided in their presence, or only mentioned with constraint. It was even sometimes the signal for a concerted silence, and though the brother entitled in due time succeeded to the intendency, he resigned it at the expiration of his second year of office. The Count d'Angeviller had at that time left the country, having fallen into irremediable pecuniary difficulties.

It was from this forced disruption of his plans that Buffon consented to his son's entering the army, the more so that he suspected him, in resigning himself to a life of science, to have less consulted his tastes than his filial affection. Some short time later, aware that age was rapidly gaining on him, and anxious to witness his son's establishment, he sanctioned his marriage with a young lady of rank and fortune, although he had scarcely yet attained his twenty-first year. The marriage was ill-fated, and circumstances ensued which led first to a rupture of the union and ultimately a judicial separation. The wrong done was on the part of the lady. The young officer stands blameless, and a letter from the old count paints touchingly his upright joy when able conscientiously to acquit his son of any part conducive to the disaster. Subsequent events gave ample corroboration to the contemporaneous testimony. The facts are now notorious which connect the "bru" of Buffon with a certain high scandal in the House of Orleans. But the old man had been then for some years dead, and the son, profiting by a new law for the re-establishment of divorce, had repaired his fortunes by a happy and most appropriate remarriage. His second wife was the daughter of his father's old and loved associate, Daubenton. This lady survived her husband for nearly sixty years.

During the period of his son's first chagrin the count persuaded him to travel, in order to beguile the memories of an importunate and oppressive past ; but after three months' absence he recalled him suddenly, desiring, as he writes, to embrace him on his eighty-first birthday. This was in September. In the December following it became evident that his end was near. A painful illness, which had for some time past been intermittent, took a permanent and decided form. Expressions reached him of the deepest solicitude from quarters humble and exalted, near and far. He was compelled to feel that all men loved him. Having made his will, and dictated a long list of directions for the improvement of the king's garden, he one morning called his friends around him, and addressed to each of them an affectionate farewell. He then enjoined on his old friend, the Father Ignatius, the accomplishment of certain last wishes respecting his son, and charged him to convey his remains to Montbard, to be interred without pomp between those of his wife and father. He died at his official residence in the king's garden, the 14th April, 1788.

The moment of his death was opportune. Not only did he escape the painful knowledge of facts made public at a later period, to the great discredit of his daughter-in-law, but also the immediate contact of those dire influences so soon to pervade all classes, and confound in indiscriminate retribution both the just and the unjust. Had he lived a few years longer, he would, perhaps, with other good men, have ended his days upon the scaffold. It is true he was beloved, but he possessed a privilege and lordly wealth. It is true he had earned one-half of his riches by the sweat of his brain, but the other was the gift of fortune and the right of birth. It is true he remitted both suit and service to his nine-score retainers, nor ever accepted a day's labor from a villain without ample compensation ; but he was a feudal seigneur, and had the right to exact obéissance, and to impose the corvée. He was, moreover, an hereditary count by a recent Act of the abhorred prerogative, and there can be no doubt that this one circumstance was the real condemnation of his son and successor, although, perhaps from an involuntary respect for the father's title, recourse was had to a pretext, in order to bring the son within the bloody scope of the proscription.

The fate of the young count is too well known to justify more than a succinct narration. During a certain time he was able, without any sacrifice of principle, to subscribe to all the exigencies of the Assembly. He was devoted to Neckar, and sincerely convinced of the necessity for real reform. At one moment he was even the object of popular enthusiasm. An ovation was offered him at Bordeaux, and he was created general of the first federation formed by the four departments composing ancient Burgundy. He was suspected, nevertheless, and his movements watched with jealousy. A delegation called on him to renounce the name of Buffon, which was open to democratic criticism, as a territorial denomination. At this he burst into tears, and declared his father's name was the pearl of his patrimony, and the last of his possessions he would voluntarily abandon. He wrote afterwards to the president of the Assembly, confirming his refusal, and urging that the name of Buffon was an appropriate souvenir in a public assembly, where Franklin's portrait was designedly selected to characterize the spirit of the national membership. The Assembly thereupon ceased to importune him on the subject of his name, but a blood-red mark was scored against it in the secret register. On the reorganization of the army, in 1790, he had been elected colonel of a regiment of infantry, but his heart sickening at the spectacle daily forced on him by the excesses of the mob in power, he had privately left the regiment, and retired to the château of Brienne. This was the opportunity that had been long sought. His name was immediately placed on the list of officers who had deserted their corps, and a warrant was issued to arrest him. Forewarned in time, he was able to remove to Paris, where he lived for some months in concealment, awaiting the occasion to escape to Brussels. Denounced by an English domestic, he was arrested one morning, and conducted to the prison of the Luxembourg. Arraigned soon after on a charge of treason, he disdainfully refused to answer the accusation, and was forthwith condemned to death by the revolutionary tribunal. At the foot of the scaffold he confided to the priest a note in pencil, together with a jewelled watch, having a miniature of his father on the inner case. These he charged him to convey to his young wife, at that time a prisoner at Dijon. He then mounted the platform, and signalled to the spectators that he desired to speak. In an instant there was breathless silence. He was himself a popular favorite, and he bore a name which endeared him to the whole nation. His firmness and self-possession were apparent in his mien and posture, and, being known to be eloquent, it was hoped he was about to launch at the republic one of those deadly satires, so much to the taste of the fickle multitude. But the emotion was far deeper, and the effect more lasting, when, after gazing an instant on the expectant crowd, the young count, unrepentantly and without effort, addressed to them these simple and affecting words: "Citoyens, je me nomme Buffon."

The writings of Buffon are pronounced by the ablest judges to be models of noble diction. His style has been often imitated, and, in two instances, with an approach to resemblance. In the majority of imitations the most praiseworthy efforts do little more than betray the artifice of their origin. The nice point is missed which renders unobvious the alliance of contrasting elements, and the effect becomes obtrusive, or the model caricatured. Buffon's simplicity is continually majestic; his grandeur lucid and accessible. It has been said he sacrificed to style, but the charge has been reduced to this: that he narrated for the charm of narrating well. Had he narrated indifferently, or dryly recorded facts, no doubt the absorbing interest of his narrative would have assured it independent life, but to him it was impossible to be conventionally prosaic; he knew of no facts not susceptible of the adornment of imagery, no substance not reducible to a form of beauty. It appears, moreover, by letters and manuscripts not accessible to the earlier critics, that both in his own and coadjutors' composition, he constantly rejected style when indulged in at the expense of clearness. "Sabrons la tirade," was his reluctant but irrevocable sentence, as, with averted eyes and longing heart, he blotted out some image or expression, brilliant and energetic, but tending to obscure the sense, or involve the language of the text. Voltaire's critique was addressed exclusively to the matter treated, which, from him, was a tacit approval of the form of treating; for Voltaire, who deemed all rival glory as so much taken from his own, would have been the first to detect, and the very last to screen, a vice of style. He had ridiculed the theory of the shells discovered on the naked summits of the Alps, suggesting that they had been shaken from the clothes of pilgrims journeying to Rome. Buffon's reply was tardy, but unanswerable, and Voltaire discreetly shelved the question with an evasive compliment. He was not going, he said, to quarrel with a man like Buffon, "pour des coquilles."

All critics, however, agree in ranking Buffon amongst the first and highest writers of his age. The talent for descriptive painting had never before attained such a degree of truthful perfection. Philosophy and natural history became then first and thenceforth united in eternal and indissoluble bonds. Later observers, beyond all doubt, have redressed many grave errors, and brought light to bear in larger cubes on mysteries imperfectly explained; but all have worked in trenches first opened by their glorious precursor, and all regard him justly as designer of the boundless plan, which so many great men, his successors, have since defined and illustrated. The ideas of Buffon have now been amply tested, and in the main sanctioned by the involuntary assent of all subsequent geologists. The "revolutions" of Cuvier are but the reproduction of the "ages" of Buffon in a more elaborate and perfect form; and though it is not probable that any system of geology will be ever more than a proposition awaiting demonstration, it is certain that the "Epochs of Nature" will remain the groundwork of succeeding speculations, however changed in form or strengthened by the observations of experience. Within certain limits as to the laws of movement and the duration of given periods, the works of Buffon have been to all other naturalists what Johnson's dictionary has been to all subsequent lexicographers.

But another merit attaches to the works of Buffon; one quite independent of their classical value, and one appreciable alike by the scientific and the unlearned; it was they that first, as it were, set the fashion of the love of nature, and inspired all classes with a passion for natural history. It was Buffon's unaided genius that lent to the study of natural history the charm it now possesses. The Swede Linnaeus could not do it. His works attract the learned, but they affright the simple. Cuvier could not do it; the admiration he inspires is not unmixed with awe. Lacépède could not have done it; he continues worthily the works of Buffon; but where Buffon ends and Lacépède begins, the reader feels that kind of ungrateful discontent experienced by those who pass suddenly from Hume to Smollett, in one of the most absorbing periods of the history of England. Buffon was unique in genius, and unsurpassed in vastness of design. Amongst the poems written to celebrate his fame, the fine stanzas of Lebrun rank foremost for chastened sentiment and grandeur of expression, but Montbeillard's unassuming ode contains by far the happiest and most appropriate homage. Alluding to the seven epochs of Nature, the poet affects to treat as a period overlooked the birthday of the great naturalist; for surely, he exclaims, the day which dawned upon the birth of Buffon was also "Une époque de la Nature."

Janin asserts of the "Natural History" that its influence on the period of Louis XV. was as powerful as that of the Georgics of Virgil on the age of Augustus. He adds that Buffon was mighty amongst the moralists of his age; that he protected with his countenance that science which was the aim and solace of his whole existence, and that scientific Europe surrounded him to the last hour of his life with gratitude, respect, and admiration. His appearance corresponded to the idea of his person suggested by his works. His face was grave and handsome, his mien imposing. His smile, somewhat controlled by an expression of sadness, revealed that deep-seated benevolence, that horror of oppression which lives through all his writings, and which assumes the form of exhortation or of passionate remonstrance, as need may dictate or occasion invite. His manners were affable and unaffected. Each Sunday, when at home, he repaired, after morning service, to an avenue of limes which had become the habitual rendezvous of the villagers and peasants. There, without airs of protection, or show of condescension, he conversed gayly and unreservedly with all around him. He was fond of dress, and usually appeared in his seigneurial costume, with frilled wristbands and brocaded facings. To see him thus, with his sword at his side, and surrounded by his attached and contented tenantry, was said to be a sight to reconcile the most rabid republican to feudal domination. It was on some such occasion that he was seen by the historian Hume, who writes that he resembled rather a marshal of France than a peaceful writer upon birds and fishes.

Needless to say, that what was formerly the king's garden is now the Jardin des Plantes, an institution made sometimes the subject of an inept comparison. It should not be forgotten that the exhibition is gratuitous, and that the garden, properly so called, is only an insignificant portion of the comprehensive whole. It might be well to refrain from passing judgment on the entire establishment, till a few months have been passed in studious examination of the marvels of the interior.

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF JOHN ACKLAND.

A TRUE STORY.

IN THIRTEEN CHAPTERS. CHAPTER X.

MR. D'OILEY, the watchmaker, was a strange mixture of practical shrewdness and an inveterate appetite for the miraculous. Spiritualism had not then been invented. Otherwise Mr. D'Oiley would surely have been one of its most enthusiastic disciples. But on the subject of animal magnetism, electro-biology, presentiments, clairvoyance, and second sight, Mr. D'Oiley was great and terrible. The whole story of John Ackland, in all its details, had been discussed in every circle of Richmond society, high and low. Mr. D'Oiley was well up in it; and he had formed very decided opinions about it. He confided them to the wife of his bosom.

"Just look at the case without prejudice," said Mr. D'Oiley, in the confidence of the nuptial couch. "How does it stand, ma'am? It is well known that Cartwright owed Ackland a large sum of money. It is equally well known, ma'am, that Cartwright never had a large sum of money,—of his own. How, then, did he get the money with which he says he paid off his debt to Ackland? There are only two ways, my dear, in which that man could have got that money,—either by a loan from some other person, to be repaid at the shortest possible date, or by a forgery. The first is not probable. The second is. In either case it would have been a matter of vital importance to Cartwright to regain possession of the money he paid to Ackland. In the one case, in order to liquidate the second loan on which he must have raised it; in the other case, to recover the forged draft before it fell due. The moment he had succeeded in securing Ackland's receipt for the money, he had nothing more to fear from Ackland. Why did Cartwright talk so much about his transactions with Ackland? Why did he show about Ackland's receipt for the money, if it were not to avert suspicion from himself after Ackland's disappearance, by making every one say, 'Cartwright could have had no motive to murder Ackland, for he owed him nothing?' Mark my words, Mrs. D. Time will show that John Ackland never left Virginia alive, and that he fell by the hand of Philip Cartwright."

"But in that case," objected Mrs. D., "why has the body never been found?"

"Time will show," replied Mr. D'Oiley, oracularly. "But you don't suppose that dead bodies are in the habit of walking about with their heads in their hands and showing themselves off, like waxworks? Eh?"

It is needless to say that both Mr. and Mrs. D. believed even more in Miss Simpson's magnetic gift than did Miss Simpson herself. That young lady, whenever the subject of John Ackland was referred to, assured her friends that she did not doubt she had talked a great deal of nonsense about Mr. Ackland, but she had not the least recollection of anything she might have said. This subject was inexpressibly distasteful to her, and she requested that it might not be discussed in her presence. What was very extraordinary, and very much remarked, was the invincible repugnance which, ever since that day at Glenoak, Miss Simpson appeared to entertain towards Mr. Cartwright. She studiously avoided him, and if ever she happened, unavoidably, to find herself in the same room with him, or even to meet him in the street, it was noticed that she became visibly agitated, and turned away her eyes from him with an expression of horror. She either could not, or would not, give any explanation of this conduct, but gradually and imperceptibly Miss Simpson's studious avoidance of Mr. Cartwright affected the relations and intimate friends of this young lady with an uncomfortable and unfavorable impression in regard to that gentleman. Nor did time, as it went by, improve either the fortunes, the character, or the reputation of Philip Cartwright. He neglected his property more than ever, and was constantly absent from Glenoak, haunting the hells, bars, and bowling-alleys of Richmond and all the neighboring towns, apparently with no other purpose than to get rid of time disreputably. He drank fiercely, and the effects of habitual intoxication began to render his character so savage and sullen that in the course of a few years he entirely lost that personal popularity which he had formerly enjoyed.

Poor Virginia Cartwright had a sad and solitary life of it at Glenoak. Her father's affection for her was undiminished; nay, it seemed stronger than ever, but there was a fierceness and wildness about it which was rather terrible than soothing. And he himself had yet the grace to feel that he was no fit companion for his daughter. He was rarely with her, and though numerous friends at Richmond and in the neighborhood never ceased to urge her to visit them, and always received her with a sort of compassionate tenderness of manner, yet their kindness only wounded and embarrassed her. For Virginia Cartwright was sensitively proud, and proud even of her disreputable parent. So the poor young lady lived in great seclusion at Glenoak, of which she was undisputed mistress; and where, by her care and good sense, she contrived to prevent the property from altogether going to the dogs.

CHAPTER XI.

One afternoon in January (a bright, clear, frosty afternoon, when the ice was white on the James River) Miss Cartwright ordered her pony carriage and drove herself over to Richmond. It was just six years since the date of John Ackland's visit to Glenoak, and Miss Cartwright was just sixteen years of age. Any one who saw her as she drove into Richmond that afternoon, with the glow in her dark Southern cheek heightened by the healthy cold, would have admitted that Virginia Cartwright had nobly fulfilled John Ackland's prophecies of her future beauty. People turned in the street to admire her as she passed. After visiting various stores where Miss Cartwright made various little purchases, the pony carriage stopped at the door of Mr. D'Oiley, the watchmaker, and Miss Cartwright, alighting, left her watch with one of the shopmen to be cleaned and repaired, and returned to her by the postman as soon as possible. Just as she was leaving the shop Mr. D'Oiley entered it from his back parlor.

"That is a very valuable chronometer of yours, miss," said Mr. D'Oiley, taking up the watch and examining it. "Not American make. No. I never saw but one watch like this in my life. May I ask, miss, where you purchased it?"

"I did not purchase it," said Virginia. "It was a gift, and I value it highly. Pray be careful of it, and return it to me as soon as you can." So saying, she left the shop.

Mr. D'Oiley screwed his microscope into his eye, opened Miss Cartwright's chronometer, and probed and examined it. Suddenly a gleam of triumphant intelligence illumined Mr. D'Oiley's features. Taking the watch with him, he withdrew into the back parlor, and, carefully closing the door, took down from the shelf several volumes of old ledgers, which he examined carefully. At last Mr. D'Oiley found what he was looking for. "The Lord," exclaimed Mr. D'Oiley, "the Lord has delivered Philip Cartwright into mine hand!"

After nearly an hour's secret consultation with the wife of his bosom, Mr. D'Oiley then repaired to the house of Dr. Simpson, where he sought and obtained an interview with that gentleman.

"Dear me!" said Dr. Simpson. "What is the matter Mr. D'Oiley? You seem quite excited."

"I am excited, sir. This is a mighty serious matter, Dr. Simpson. And truly the ways of Providence are wonderful. Now, look at this watch. Did you ever see a watch like it before?"

"Not that I know of," said the doctor.

"I never did, sir, and I suppose I've seen as many watches as any man in these United States. Now, you follow me, Dr. Simpson. And keep your eyes, sir, on this remarkable watch that you see here in my hand. Six years ago that Mr. Ackland, who was your fellow-guest at Glenoak, called at my store, and asked me to clean this remarkable watch, and set it. I took particular notice of this remarkable watch. And I took down the number of it in my books. I said to Mr. Ackland, when I handed his watch back to him, 'This is a very remarkable watch, sir.' 'Well, sir,' says he, 'it is a remarkable watch, but it loses time, sir.' 'It won't lose time, now, sir,' says I; 'I'll warrant that watch of yours to go right for six years now that I've fixed it up,' said I. Well, sir, and the watch has gone right for six years. It's just six years and six months, Dr. Simpson, sir, since Mr. Ackland got this watch fixed up by me, and took it with him to Glenoak. And it's not six hours since Miss Cartwright called at my store, and brought me this very re-markable watch to fix up again."

"God bless my soul!" cried Dr. Simpson.

"You may well say that, Dr. Simpson, sir," responded Mr. D'Oiley. "I said to Miss Cartwright, 'May I make so bold, miss, as to ask where you happened to purchase this watch of yours?' 'Didn't purchase it,' says she, 'it was a gift, and off she goes.'"

"But you don't mean to say—"

"I do mean to say it, sir. I mean to say that I don't believe Mr. Ackland would have given this very valuable chronometer to Virginia Cartwright, who was a mere chit when Mr. A. was at Glenoak. I mean to say, sir, that I do believe, and always have believed, and always will believe, that Mr. Ackland was foully murdered."

"Hush, hush!" exclaimed the doctor: "you have no right to say that, Mr. D'Oiley."

"But I do say it, sir," continued the watchmaker, energetically, "I do say it, — to you, at least, Dr. Simpson, sir. For I know that if you don't say it too, sir, you think it. And I know that Miss Simpson thinks it. And I say more, sir. I say that the man who gave this watch to Virginia Cartwright was a robber, as well as a murderer. That's what I say, sir."

"But you mustn't say it," said the doctor, "not unless you are prepared to —"

"Sir," said Mr. D'Oiley, "I am prepared to place this watch in the hands of justice."

"But you have no right to do anything of the kind. Justice will of course restore it to its present legal owner, Miss Cartwright. And let me tell you, Mr. D'Oiley, that this is a very delicate matter, in which any imprudence may easily bring you to trouble. Will you leave the watch — at least for a few days — in my hands? Miss Cartwright will doubtless be able to explain satisfactorily her possession of it. I will promise to see her immediately, and, if necessary, her father also. What do you say?"

Mr. D'Oiley would not consent to relinquish possession of the watch, which, as he again declared, "the Lord had delivered into his hands," but he reluctantly agreed to take no further steps in the matter until Dr. Simpson had seen Miss Cartwright. The doctor went to Glenoak next day and did see Miss Cartwright: from whom he learned that she had received the watch from her father as a birthday gift, on the occasion of her last birthday a year ago.

Where was her father? In Maysville, she believed. But it was nearly a month since she had heard from him. To Maysville went the doctor, and the first man he met at the bar of the Maysville hotel was Philip Cartwright. Cartwright was furious when he learned the object of the doctor's visit. "Of course," he said, "the watch had belonged to his poor friend John Ackland, who had given it to him as a birthday gift the year before which he left Glenoak. And tell that scoundrel, D'Oiley," he added, "that if he don't immediately restore it to my daughter, I'll arrest him for a thief."

That gentleman, however, was neither disconcerted nor despondent.

"It is my conviction, sir," said he, "it has long been my conviction, sir, that I shall be guided by the finger of Providence to unravel this great mystery, and bring detection home to as black a criminal as ever burdened God's earth, sir. And since you tell me, Dr. Simpson, sir, that I have no help for it but to restore this watch to its unrightful owner, I shall take it back to Glenoak, and place it in Miss Cartwright's hands, myself."

CHAPTER XII.

Miss Cartwright thanked the watchmaker for taking so much care of her watch, and bringing it back to her with his own hands. She begged that he would take some refreshment before leaving Glenoak, and remain there as long as he pleased. The weather was not very inviting; but if he liked to ride or walk in the plantation, Mr. Spinks, the overseer, would show him over it.

Mr. D'Oiley thanked Miss Cartwright for her kind condescension to "a poor overworked son of the busy city, miss." He was not much of an equestrian, and Mr. Cartwright's steeds had the reputation of being dangerous to bad riders, like himself. But there was nothing he liked so much as a good country walk on a fine frosty day; and, with Miss Cartwright's kind permission, he would gladly take a stroll about these beautiful premises before returning to town.

The first thing that roused Mr. D'Oiley's curiosity, when he commenced his stroll about the beautiful premises, was the shrieking of a miserable old negro, who was wailing under the lash.

"What is the man's fault?" he inquired of the overseer, who was standing by, to see that punishment was thoroughly inflicted.

"Man, you call him, do you?" responded Mr. Spinks. "I call him, sir, a darned pig-headed brute. We can't, none of us, get him to take that load of ice into the ice-house, and it's spoiling."

"Well, but," said Mr. D'Oiley, "the load seems a heavy one, and he don't look good for much."

"Good for much? He ain't good for anything."

"Why won't you take the ice, Sambo?" asked the watchmaker.

"I ain't Sambo," said the negro, sullenly and cowering; "I'm Ned, old Uncle Ned."

"Well, why won't you do as you're told, Uncle Ned?"

"'Cause poor old Ned he no dare, massa. Old Ned he no like Bogie in de ice-house. Bogie, he worse nor massa by night, and massa he worse nor Bogie by day. Poor Uncle Ned, he berry bad time of it."

Mr. D'Oiley had another illumination.

"Well now, you look here, Mr. Spinks. Reckon I'd like to buy that nigger o' you, sir. He ain't worth much, you know."

"Well, sir, he ain't bright. That's a fact. But there's a deal o' field work in him yet. And he was raised on the plantation, you see, and knows it well."

"Ah, indeed!" said the watchmaker, as though very much surprised to hear it. "Knows it well, does he? Say a hundred dollars for him, Mr. Spinks?"

"Not two hundred, sir."

"Not less than a thousand, Mr. D'Oiley. I assure you, sir, Mr. Cartwright would n't hear of it. He's uncommon fond of this nigger. He's quite a partiality for this nigger has Mr. Cartwright, sir."

"Did you say a thousand, Mr. Spinks?"

"I did, sir."

"Split the difference, Mr. Spinks. Make it five hundred, sir."

"Done, sir."

"Done with you, sir," returned the watchmaker; "and if you'll take my check for it, I'll carry him back in my buggy. Nothing like settling things at once."

"Take your note of hand for a million, sir," responded the overseer, delighted to have sold a broken-down nigger so advantageously, at double the market price.

That very night the owner of Glenoak returned unexpectedly to his ancestral mansion. His first act was to send for Mr. Spinks. "I want to see Uncle Ned, Mr. Spinks. Send the brute up immediately."

"Uncle Ned? Why, Mr. Cartwright, I've just sold him, and very advantageously. He's not been worth his keep for the last three years."

Words cannot describe the frantic paroxysm of wrath into which Mr. Cartwright was thrown by this announcement.

"But, indeed, Mr. Cartwright," expostulated the overseer, "I thought that, in your interest, when I found Mr. D'Oiley willing to give five hundred —"

"You sold him to D'Oiley?"

"Yes, sir, this afternoon."

"You villain!" howled Cartwright, springing at the throat of the overseer. But his humor suddenly changed. "Never mind, now," he growled, flinging the overseer against the wall, "the mischief's done now. Order round the wagon and team this moment, and bring me all the money you have in the house, and then get out of my sight."

Mr. Cartwright strode up stairs, and entered his daughter's room. "Virgy," he said, with a dim eye and husky voice, "I'm going away, — I'm going at once, and I'm going far, far, far. If you stay at Glenoak, Virgy, maybe we sha'n't meet again; anyhow, not for a long, long while. If you'll come with me we'll never part, my girl; but the way's a long one, and the future's dark as night, and there's danger behind us. What will you do, Virgy?"

"O father, father!" cried the frightened girl, "how can you ask? I will never leave you!"

That night, Philip Cartwright and his daughter left Glenoak, never to return.

CHAPTER XIII.

It was about a fortnight after Glenoak had been deserted by its owners that the much-injured Mr. Spinks, whilst debating with himself the knotty question whether it were best to retain his situation, in the hope of further plunder, or to throw it up in vindication of his outraged dignity, was unpleasantly surprised by a second visit from Mr. D'Oiley, accompanied by Dr. Simpson, Judge Griffin, Mr. Inspector Tanin, and half a dozen constables.

"Now, Mr. Spinks," said Inspector Tanin, "you'll be good enough, if you please, sir, to set all hands on, to remove the ice out of that there ice-house of yours. I have a search-warrant, sir, to search these premises. And do you know what this is, Mr. Spinks? It's a warrant for the arrest of Philip S. Cartwright, whensoever and wheresoever he can be found in the territory of the United States."

"On what charge?" asked Mr. Spinks.

"Murder," replied the inspector, laconically.

Mr. Spinks was persuaded. Mr. Cartwright's slaves were ordered to open Mr. Cartwright's ice-house and remove the ice.

Be it known to the reader that every country-house in America is provided with an excellent ice-house of the simplest and most practical kind. It consists of a deep excavation in the earth, roofed over with a pointed thatch. These ice-houses are always well filled in the winter, and rarely, if ever, quite emptied during the summer. It was long past dark before the men at work in the ice-house at Glenoak had removed all the loose ice from the pit. The lower layers were frozen as hard as granite, and could only be broken up by the pickaxe: so that the work went on slowly by torchlight. At last Mr. Inspector, who had descended into the pit to superintend this final operation, called to those above for a stout rope. The rope was not immediately forthcoming; and when the submissive Spinks (who had been despatched to get one from the cart-house) returned with it in his hand the excitement of the spectators was intense. Uncle Ned, at his most urgent request, had been exempted from the ordeal of this expedition to Glenoak.

"Now pull!" cried Mr. Inspector from the bottom of the pit, "and pull gently."

The rope came up heavily. No wonder. There was a dead body fastened to the end of it. That dead body was the body of John Ackland. All present who had ever seen John Ackland recognized it at once, in despite of the lacerated skull and partially mangled features. For the ice had so wonderfully preserved the hideous secret confided to its frozen clasp, that the murdered man looked as freshly dead as if he had perished only an hour ago.

In the subsequent search of Glenoak a copy of John Ackland's letter to his cousin was found in Mr. Cartwright's desk. He had not taken the precaution of destroying it. Doubtless he had felt that if once the body of John Ackland were discovered at Glenoak, it little mattered what else was discovered there. And when he learned from his overseer that Uncle Ned had been sold to D'Oiley, he knew that he was a ruined man, and that his paramount concern was to place himself as quickly as possible beyond the reach of the law.

Mr. D'Oiley's triumph was great. He had worked hard for it. Never had he exercised so much ingenuity and patience as in the moral manipulation whereby he had finally elicited from Uncle Ned the revelations which had led to the discovery.

This was the substance of them: Philip Cartwright, whilst riding with his unfortunate guest through his own plantation, had slackened pace, and falling a little to the rear of his companion's horse, deliberately shot John Ackland through the back of the head. The wounded gentleman immediately fell from his saddle. Cartwright quietly alighted, and finding that there was still a faint flutter of life left in his victim, beat him about the head till he beat the life out of him with the butt-end of his gun. He then carefully examined the mare which Mr. Ackland had been riding, wiped every trace of blood from the saddle, turned it, and with a sharp cut of his whip started the beast into a gallop, in a direction away from the house. Thus left alone with the dead body, his next care was to dispose of it. All this happened in broad daylight, a good hour before sundown. Mr. Cartwright's own slaves were still at work in the surrounding fields. They must have heard the report of the firearm; they might possibly have witnessed the fall of the victim. But what of that? They were slaves. Philip Cartwright well knew that in no American court of justice could a white man be convicted of crime on the evidence of a man of color. He knew that none of his slaves could give evidence against him, even if they had witnessed every particular of his crime. He tied his own horse to a tree, and walked leisurely to the gate of the field. Leaning over it he perceived some of his own negroes at work in the adjoining ground; amongst them an old negro, whom he knew by experience that he could intimidate and cow, more easily even than the others. He beckoned this slave to him, and said coolly, as if it were the most natural announcement in the world, "I have just shot a man down; you must come along, Uncle Ned, and help me to carry the body into the ice-house." It was late in the summer season and the ice-house at Glenoak was nearly empty. Quite empty it never was. With some difficulty Cartwright and the slave removed the upper layer of ice, and buried the body underneath it. "And now look ye here," said Cartwright, "if ever you utter to a human being about what's in that ice-house, or what I've told you, or what you've just been doing, I'll flay you alive and roast you afterwards. All the same I won't have any talking, or hinting, or winking. Do you understand? If you don't teach your eyes to forget what they've seen, I'll gouge 'em out. If you don't teach your ears to forget what they've heard, I'll cut 'em off. If you don't teach your tongue to be silent, I'll tear it out by the roots. So now you know what I mean. Get along with you." Before burying John Ackland's body, however, the murderer had rifled the dead man, and repossessed himself of the forged notes which John Ackland (as Cartwright well knew) carried in the belt lent to him by Cartwright expressly for that purpose. Unluckily for Mr. Cartwright, while he was engaged in this operation his eye was tempted by what Mr. D'Oiley had called "that very re-markable watch, sir," and he hastily thrust John Ackland's chronometer into his own pocket. But for this superfluous felony, in all human probability Philip Cartwright would have carried safely with him to his own grave the secret of his great crime.

The first question asked by the present writer of the Virginian gentleman from whom he received the details of this strange story was, "How did Philip Cartwright die?"

"Well, you see the law could n't reach him in Texas, which was n't then annexed. But John Ackland's cousin, and some of his friends in the North, and some of us down here in Virginia, constituted themselves a committee of vengeance. They were sworn to have Philip Cartwright's life, but to have it according to law. They found him in Texas, not far over the border, where he had set up a faro bank; and they disguised themselves, and they frequented the bank, and they played against him, and betted with him, till one night they succeeded in tempting him over the border, on the chance of plucking a fat pigeon there: but the officers of justice were waiting for him there; and, by gad, sir, we arrested him, and tried him all square, and hanged him hard."

"And his daughter?"

"Poor girl, she did n't long survive her journey to Texas, and the rough life she had of it there. It was better for her. She was spared the knowledge of her father's guilt, and the humiliation of his death, and she loved the blackguard to the last."

LITTLE MISS DEANE.

I.

BELFIELD SQUARE, "our square" as we its inhabitants were accustomed to call it, is a suburban square on the outskirts of the noise and traffic of the great city; and yet it is not in the country. The fields about it are mostly brickfields, the streets which open into it are paved London streets, and the quiet which pervades it is not the murmuring peacefulness of a country lane, but rather the stillness of a highway, where only those sit down to rest who are too tired to go farther. We are most of us middle-aged people; we have for the most part done with the bustle and excitement of life; in our own square we find shut in our greatest interests and our closest ties. We pass out of it on our little missions of charity and kindness; but as for our social pleasures, they are chiefly such as spring from intercourse amongst ourselves; there is a slender, invisible chain running round the square which connects us with each other, and the links are rarely broken.

The houses are generally inhabited by portions or remnants of families. There is a brother and sister in No. 1, and an old lady next door. There are two maiden sisters in No. 5, and a widow with a little lane boy in No. 7. There are two brothers, who in a quiet way carry on solicitors' business, in No. 10; and there is a doctor at the corner. Then in the big house in the middle of the square old Mr. Deane has lived for the last twenty years: only one or two people can remember when he first came to live there. The big house must have been there long before the square was built, for it is an old house, much older than those which have sprung up around it. It has a large walled garden behind it, where apricots and peaches ripen in the autumn, and where children might have hedged round their little gardens and worn the grass with their aimless pattering feet, and young people might have read and worked and played croquet through the summer afternoons, in spite of the London smoke which is drifted overhead. But as it chanced, there were no little children to pick the daisies, and there were no young people to wander about the walks in the summer twilight.

People had often wondered why Mr. Deane lived alone in his big house, keeping his riches, and comforts, and feelings to himself; we sociable people pitied him for the solitary state in which he lived; and if he would have allowed us we should have been very ready to welcome him to our firesides, though he was rather an alarming person in some respects. He was nearly seventy years of age, I believe; a tall, thin, stately man, with overwhelming polite manners. The expression of his mouth was somewhat severe and cynical, his cold blue beneath his polished exterior there were sometimes startling flashes of nervous excitement and irritation. Some people who were romantic enough to like a little mystery used to declare that it was plain he had something upon his conscience, but, for my part, I liked the old gentleman. He generally made his way up to me when we happened to meet in society; he could be agreeable when he chose: and I think he liked me.

I was then no longer young; indeed, I do not think that I ever had been young. Mine had been a hard, struggling life; I had never had time for the pleasant troubles and uncertain hopes which hang around the youth of most girls. Perhaps it might have been different if I had been particularly clever or beautiful; but my practical difficulties had occupied my whole thoughts at a time when I should have been acquiring knowledge; and as to beauty, no one ever paid me a higher compliment than when my old nurse consoled me by the assurance that I was "very passable." I dare say she was right; for certainly I passed through life without attracting much observation.

After my parents' death I took a small house, one of the smallest, in Belfield Square. When that little house is once more to be let or sold I shall have dropped out of life altogether. Once only have I left it since I first came to live here, — once for a year; but it was an eventful year in my quite life, and as I look back upon it, it stands out as a distinct portion of my existence.

How well I remember my surprise when I received Mr. Deane's letter. I remember every word of it, — the old-fashioned phrases and the stiff, cramped handwriting. A brother of his had died in very distressed circumstances, leaving an only daughter. Her other relations were too poor to bring her up in a befitting manner, and he proposed to take this charge upon himself. Would I lend my valuable assistance?

The offer was couched in the most delicate and ambiguous words, but the upshot of it was that he proposed to engage me at a fixed and most liberal salary as resident governess or companion to this young lady. Well, I pondered it long, and finally I accepted the offer. I was somewhat weary of my solitude; I felt a curiosity to see something new; it was November, the weather was dull, and I was dull; and finally, I had a friendly wish to be of service to Mr. Deane. Looking back upon it, I can hardly tell what determined me, but I was determined, and I closed with the offer.

I confess that when I went to establish myself in my new home my heart failed me a little. I felt as if the servants despised me, and knew that I was only Miss Ford from the little house over the way. Mr. Deane was alarming, with his courteous welcome and formal hope that I would make myself at home. I felt as if he, too, knew that it was an unwonted luxury to find a fire blazing in my bedroom, and I cowered over it, feeling shy and miserable, and glad to turn from the reflection of my own scared face in the large pier-glasses.

As I glided softly down the stairs I thought somewhat compassionately of my future charge. How strange it would seem to her, entering upon a new life in the constrained atmosphere of that house, which seemed as if it never could have echoed to the sound of children's feet. But upon the other hand, she would be at once placed in a higher position; Mr. Deane would of course make her as happy and content as possible.

gles of a poverty-stricken home, it might well be that the elevation would dazzle her for a time. I thought it all over as I sat upon an ottoman in the middle of the large, formally furnished drawing-room, awaiting her arrival.

There was a sharp ring, a bustle in the hall, then the door opened and little Miss Deane stood before me. She looked about sixteen, and was small of her age. Her features were regular and delicate, her eyebrows arched and clearly defined, her complexion perfectly colorless, her expression very grave. I had looked for a little shrinking from the new scene, and for some natural diffidence at a first meeting with strangers; but she came forward at once, apparently without the least shyness, and held out her hand to me, not cordially, but with instinctive courtesy.

"You must be cold and tired," I said rather nervously, for her composure made me feel a little shy. "Won't you come to the fire, and will you have some tea?"

"No, thank you. But if you please I should like to go to my own room."

There was composure in her manner, but the voice that answered me was very sweet and child-like, and now, when she lifted her deep brown eyes to mine, I began to feel drawn towards her. She had taken off her hat, and the soft wavy locks of dark hair which clustered low over her forehead shadowed the somewhat too severe outlines of her face.

Apparently it was not the first constraint of her arrival which made her words so few, and her composure so repelling. With her uncle she was equally unembarrassed, quiet, and undemonstrative; she was very grateful to him, and she said so; but whether her outward calmness proceeded from indifference or suppressed excitement I could not tell. In spite of her childish looks it was impossible to care, and equally impossible to contradict her. She never seemed to need sympathy or encouragement, and yet she was not uncourteous; she was simply gentle, independent, and reserved. I thought it was best to let time do its work, and I let her alone; but I sometimes wished that she might find it in her heart to confide in me.

One day I could not help saying, "Do you not feel a little strange, Laurette, in this big house, alone with Mr. Deane and me? Are you never a little homesick?"

"No, Miss Ford," she said, and she looked up with a little smile; "I am not homesick, because I know that I shall go home some day. One can always wait, you know."

"I don't quite understand," I said, feeling perplexed as to the meaning of her words. "It is all changed now. Mr. Deane wants you to live with him always. Your aunt would not wish to take you back, away from all that you have here, even if you should wish to leave Mr. Deane, which is what you are thinking of, I suppose."

"I shall go back to my old home some day," she persisted. But then she turned to her work, and would say no more.

She was not repellent or uncourteous, and yet it seemed impossible to know more about her. What seemed her old habits were kept up in her new circumstances. Nothing appeared to dazzle or surprise her. Day after day she sat down to her sewing, as I suppose she had sat down to it in her aunt's little parlor. The yards of beautiful embroidery which passed through her little hands were beyond anything that I had ever supposed it to be possible for women's hands to compass, but she never seemed tired. After a time I began to suspect that it went to her aunt: it was finished, folded up, and then it disappeared. Possibly she helped, as hitherto, to support the family by needle-work. Certainly she spent very little upon herself, though her uncle behaved most liberally to her in respect of pocket-money.

It is true her wants were few. Her dress was always plain and simple, but somehow it suited her slight, childish figure better than gay, bright colors, and I did not wish to see it altered, though, as a rule, I like to see young people dress like young people. As to her reading, it was confined to fairy tales on week-days and her Bible on Sundays: more had evidently never been a habit with her. Yet she did not seem to want food for thought. Whilst at work I am sure her mind was ever busy, and when twilight darkened round us, she would lay her work aside, and creeping to the window, curl herself up on the window-seat and sit there, looking out into the street, as the darkness deepened and the lamps were lighted, and the people passed up and down; dreaming her own thoughts, no doubt, and seeing her own visions.

She went about amongst the neighbors with me, and they all made a great deal of "little Miss Deane," as she was always called in the Square; but she seemed to care nothing for admiration, and she did not really get on with them.

Mr. Deane had said that he looked upon her as a daughter, so of course every one knew that she would be an heiress, and perhaps they sought her the more upon that account; but she never seemed to see it; only, as I have said before, she did not get on with them. It astonished and vexed me a little.

"Why do you not talk more, Laurette?" I said; "you will make people think you proud. Why do you not make more friends? don't you like people?"

"I like you, Miss Ford," she said; and, undemonstrative as she was, the simple assertion gratified me.

By degrees she told me more of her former life. She talked of her sickly, patient aunt, of the struggles for bread, of their goodness to her. But some day she would make them happy.

"You mean when you marry, I suppose? You think that you will marry and be rich some day?" I asked curiously.

"I don't know," she said, and let her work fall suddenly.

II.

It was nearly Christmas-time when a new element was introduced into the quiet monotony of our life. Mr. Deane had been looking harassed for some time, and complaining of overwork. At this time he engaged as confidential clerk a young Canadian who had just come to England, and applied for employment at Deane & Co.'s firm in the City. Mr. Deane still went to his office every day, but he had generally business to transact at home, and it was principally to assist him in this that Mr. Charleton was engaged.

I heard of the plan with placid indifference, little thinking what a change he was to make in my little Laurette's destiny. Yet now, as I think of it, I remember so well his first arrival.

The tall, athletic young man, standing in the firelight, with an amused smile upon his face, as Laurette, who had been dreaming as usual, curled up in the window-seat, came forward, pushing aside the curtain and looked at him, opening her dark eyes wide as if she saw the realization of a vision. What a pretty picture it made! As she stood hesitating, with one hand still upon the curtain, with her hair clustering round her forehead, and a little flush of surprise upon her face, she looked so much younger than she really was that I was not surprised at his taking her for a child.

"Won't you shake hands with me?" he said, still smiling, and holding out his hand, and then Laurette stepped forward and put her slender little hand in his.

I do not quite know how it was, but in a very short time Charleton came to be quite at home in the house. Mr. Deane placed great confidence in him, although it was not his habit to lean much upon any one; indeed, he admitted him to an intimate footing at which I secretly wondered, more especially as Charleton's personal demeanor denoted none of the caution which should have characterized Mr. Deane's confidential clerk. I suppose he was discreet about business affairs, and he certainly must have shown great ability thus to obtain and retain his employer's favor; but his manners were singularly free and open, and although I felt the force of his character, it was veiled under so light and gay an exterior, that I often found myself wondering how his opinions came to be so formed, and his expression of them so decided.

There was nothing in the least conceited about him. He was certainly handsome, tall, and well made, with thick tawny hair and open gray eyes; but I am sure he cared nothing for his good looks; there was nothing conscious in his ways. He worked hard, sometimes at the office, sometimes in the study at the back of the house, and he did his business, as he did everything else, heartily and thoroughly. Mr. Deane often said he had never come across a clearer-headed man, and he grew to depend upon him more and more every day. He enjoyed his conversation, he liked his free good-humor, and encouraged him to spend his evenings with us. Laurette would sit a little in the background, sewing by the light of the lamp on her work-table, and now and then lift her eyes for a glance at her uncle and Charleton, as they sat over the fire discussing and arguing over their newspaper and the questions of the day.

Seeing her so constantly thrown with Charleton into the closeness of domestic intercourse, I could not help weaving a little romance about them. But I was soon sorry that I had allowed myself to entertain such an idea, for I saw that he cared nothing for her, looking upon her simply as a child; and I began to fear that unconsciously the same thought had sprung up in Laurette's mind. Since the day when she had said, "I like you, Miss Ford," she had drawn much closer to me; her love, once given, was sure not to be withdrawn; and, watching her shy, wistful glances at Charleton, I began to fear for her.

It was Christmas-day. Charleton was going to some friends in the evening, but he was to breakfast and go to church with us. Laurette came down, grave as usual, but nevertheless with a holiday brightness about her. She had prepared her presents,—a purse for her uncle and a book for me, and she had a child's pleasure in her little surprises. I thought it was pretty to see her flush of pleasure as Mr. Deane kissed her, and said with less formality than usual, "It is a pleasure to me to have you here, Laurette."

"A merry Christmas," she said shyly, holding out her hand to Charleton. He smiled, but answered her a little carelessly I thought, as he retired behind his newspaper. Then she went round to her own place. Her plate was filled with gifts, but she did not touch them. She sat quite still with her hands before her, looking at them as if she could hardly believe it. Charleton was laughing behind his newspaper.

"Are they for me?" she said very softly.

"Of course they are for you, Laurette."

"I did not think that any one would give me anything," she said, very gently, and then she slowly opened the parcels. There was a watch and chain from her uncle; her aunt had sent her an embroidered handkerchief, and I had given her a copy of the "Christian Year."

"Dear Aunt Jean," she said, "it is her own work. How good of her!" and then she thanked me and her uncle; but there was still another little package lying upon her plate. She took off the wrapping, and disclosed a little silver Chinese box, very pretty and curiously engraved. It was full of bonbons.

"How pretty!" she said, smiling with pleasure. "Who can have given me this?"

I had guessed of course, and could not help glancing at Charleton.

"I am glad you like it," he said carelessly as he got up from the table, and strode out of the room. Then Laurette got up also, and walked away to the window. I thought she was glad to hide the rush of color to her face.

Perhaps it was officious of me, but I had grown so fond of her that I could not bear to see her running into danger. She had no mother, no other friend to speak a word to her, and I was angry with Charleton. Perhaps I was unreasonable; his manner was pleasant and kindly, perhaps even a little patronizing, and of course he could not help being genial and good-looking; but then Laurette might not understand it all as well as I did. It was not his fault that he was thrown so much in her way; but I did feel angry, and I wished he had kept his little box to himself.

In the evening, when Mr. Deane had gone to his study, and Laurette and I were sitting alone, I thought I would give her a little warning. She was bending over the fire, with her lips just parted by a smile and her eyes fixed upon the blaze, and I wondered what castles she was building.

I don't quite know how I did it. I know I blundered, and got confused, and did not say what I meant to say; but all the same she knew what I meant.

"It is only that you have no mother, you know, Laurette, and very likely, I dare say, I am quite wrong; but you must forgive me."

She had heard until then in passive silence, with her head bent down so that I could not see her face; but now she looked up and pushed back her hair from her forehead as if trying to banish some new and bewildering dream.

"I am not angry, Miss Ford," she said in her usual grave and childlike tones, "because, of course you could not know; and if I tell you, you must not tell my uncle: I promised not, for they said he would not like it. Miss Ford, I am engaged to my cousin, Edward Finley."

I was so much astonished that for the moment I could not speak. Then I made my answer in abrupt embarrassment.

"You don't, you can't mean it. You are much too young. And now everything is changed, you are in such a different position, I am sure he will not like it himself."

"I do not know what right you have to say he would not like it"; and now Laurette looked up and spoke a little indignantly. "It is quite certain, and he would never give me up."

I could say no more, and subsided into silence. Edward Finley had been to the house two or three times to see his cousin and bring her little messages from his mother; but the possibility of an attachment between them had never entered my mind. He was a gentlemanlike young man, rather pleasing than otherwise, but not remarkable in any way. He conversed very properly; he seemed to be fairly intelligent, altogether he was unobjectionable; but the idea of Laurette, who had somehow become a little heroine in my eyes, becoming his wife was altogether distasteful to me.

Of course I could not betray her secret to her uncle; but I did feel that the Finleys were not behaving well by him. Why did not Edward come forward, and announce his intentions like a man? He might naturally be afraid of offending Mr. Deane, and being rejected, or perhaps losing Laurette's fortune. Perhaps he was waiting until her hold upon her uncle should be more firmly established. I never for a moment wronged Laurette. She was quite happy in the simple-minded hope that she should one day bring riches to the house which had sheltered her desolate childhood, and I knew she thought of no wrong. But the Finleys had more knowledge of the world, and I did blame them for their share in the business.

That Laurette would be true to her cousin, I had no doubt. She was not likely to be shaken when once she had given her word, so I set my mind at rest about her and Charleton; indeed, just at this time I was much more occupied with Mr. Deane than with them. He had always, as I have before said, been subject to variations of temper, but lately they had grown upon him to an extent which made me very uneasy. Of course we all have our ups and downs, and it is natural to feel our cares pressing us from time to time, especially as we get on in life; but then Mr. Deane was rich and prosperous, and he had, as it were, no personal anxieties, nor was he a man to disturb himself about other people's. I could only conclude that it was health or natural temperament; but I was sorry for him when I saw how his nervous irritability grew upon him.

Laurette noticed it also, and in her pretty, quiet way did much to allay it. She had grown fond of the old man, and he watched for her comings and goings as if it were a pleasure to him to look upon her.

The days were lengthening, Edward Finley had been twice to the house, March was drawing to a close, the crocuses were brightening the gardens, and Charleton was more with us than ever. He generally came in in the evenings, though he dined elsewhere: and every now and then I fancied that he too had cares. He was less gay, more silent and abstracted, except that he seemed observant of Laurette when she chanced to be in the room.

One lovely spring day he came hurriedly into the drawing-room where I was sitting alone, writing

"Where is little Miss Deane?" he said. "I am going into the country on business; she will like the drive; we shall be back in a few hours. I can take her with me."

"Indeed you cannot," I said; and I believe I spoke rather crossly. I am one of those people who are apt to get angry when they are startled, and his abrupt entrance had discomposed me, and made me drop my ink over my paper. "How can you propose such a thing? I should not think of allowing her to go. She is not such a child as you seem to consider her."

"What nonsense!" he said, coloring and looking annoyed. "But if that is all, won't you come too? I am sure you will like it. It will do you both good. Come, Miss Ford, I know you will be glad to get out of London."

His manner was winning and cordial, and if there was cunning in it, I did not know it; so I allowed myself to be mollified, and we three set off together in the pony carriage.

The birds were singing overhead, the hedges were studded with primroses and violets, the soft west wind blew gently in my face as I lay back in the carriage, and I suppose, if I had ever been young, it would have carried me back to the days of my youth. We middle-aged women have our own spring-like pleasure. The spring which speaks to the young of the future carries us back to the past. Many half-sad, half-pleasant memories rose within me now. I thought of the primroses in the glass by my mother's couch, of the swing under the fir-trees in our old garden, of the violets by my little sister's grave.

Charleton and Laurette had wandered away into a field to look for cowslips. Suddenly all my visions vanished, and I was recalled to the present by Laurette's voice, not low and sweet as usual, but with a ring of passion and distress in it.

"No, no, I will not listen to you," and then she came quickly up to the carriage, looking pale and indignant.

Charleton followed. His expression was earnest and somewhat perplexed, as she shrank from him, turning to me, half hiding her face against me, with the gesture of a shy, wilful child. He waited patiently for a few seconds, and then he said, "What do you mean, Laurette? do you not intend to give me an answer?"

"No, no," she said, with a sharp, low cry, and I felt that she trembled as she said it.

"Why do you press and frighten her?" I said, laying my hand upon his arm. "She will tell you; you shall be told afterwards, but not now."

A slight cloud passed over his face, the look of a man who is unaccustomed to contradiction; but he urged her no longer. He gathered up the reins, and, seating himself in the carriage, drove us home, talking to me upon trivial subjects in his ordinary, every-day manner. I wondered what Laurette was thinking of, but she did not speak again.

III.

When we reached the house, I paused a moment in the hall, and then followed Laurette up stairs. I was disturbed and perplexed. Why could she not have given him his answer at once? what did her agitation mean? Alas! had I not been right? Was not Edward Finley standing like the memory of a pledge between her and the man she might have chosen?

"What answer?" I said, coming up to her in the passage.

sage. She had her hand upon the handle of her door, and her face was turned away from me, as she answered in a low voice, "You will tell him, Miss Ford."

"What am I to tell him?" I asked rather cruelly; but I did not understand her, and I longed for some assurance that my fears had been groundless.

She made no answer, but opened her door, and I followed her into the room, and sat down upon the sofa, waiting anxiously whilst she walked to the dressing-table, and stood before the glass taking off her hat and smoothing back her hair as if all was as usual with her; but I could see that her hands were trembling. Notwithstanding her usual courtesy, she took no further notice of me; so after a time I repeated my question.

"You are to tell him that I am engaged to Edward Finley, of course," she said impatiently, still standing with her back to me, and stamping her foot upon the floor. "Why do you ask, Miss Ford? you know what I meant you to say."

"Why cannot you speak to him yourself?" I said, uneasily shifting my ground, and then, as she would not seem to hear, I took courage and went on more boldly. "Do not deceive yourself in this matter, Laurette. It is an important step that you are taking. Are you sure of yourself? I know nothing, of course, but before I heard of your cousin I sometimes fancied that you liked Charleston. Are you certain that you know your own mind?"

"I am quite certain that I mean to marry my cousin Edward," said Laurette, and now she spoke with steady distinctness, and turned to look me full in the face. "You had no right to imagine anything else. What have I done, that you should think I would be false to him?"

Then I could only murmur apologies. I had been wrong, of course, and it was natural she should feel angry; but in spite of it all the misgivings could not be easily repressed. I wondered, had she given me her full confidence. In any case, I could do no more, and I left the room, penitent, but yet with an uncertain, wavering misgiving which could not be got rid of.

In the evening, when Mr. Deane was in his study and Laurette had gone to bed, I gave her message. Charleston was sitting in the arm-chair opposite to me with a book in his hand. He laid it down, and listened without any affectation of indifference, as somewhat timidly I told my story; yet he was not so much cast down as I had expected.

"So she is engaged, poor child," he said. And then he leant forward with a sigh, and looked into the fire as if wrapped in meditation. I had expected some outbreak of feeling, some show of disappointment; and in spite of my timidity I think I should have liked it better than his compassionate tone in speaking of her.

"What kind of person is this cousin? Is he sure to remain true to her?" he asked after a pause.

He had seemed to me all along entirely to ignore Laurette's fortune, and although I did not for a moment accuse him of interested motives, I was a little vexed by the cool manner in which he put it aside; so I answered, rather dryly, that I had no reason to suspect Mr. Finley of unfaithfulness, and in this case he certainly had no inducement to it.

My tone was provoking, I know, and I meant it to be so; but he took no notice of it. The grave he walked to the other end of the room and came back again before he answered.

"You do not understand me, Miss Ford," he said, "yet surely you must already have had misgivings. To-morrow everything must be known. Mr. Deane has failed; I fear very little will be saved from his creditors."

I don't think that I realized it for the first moment; it seemed so strange and inexplicable. We had always regarded Mr. Deane as so certainly prosperous, and now ruin seemed to have come upon him unawares. I felt stunned and bewildered, and for the moment could say nothing.

"Laurette, of course, knows nothing of this," he continued after a pause. "Poor child, she will be thrown once more upon the world; I wish that she could have made her home with me."

"You knew this, and therefore you spoke to her; then it was not because you had fallen in love with her?"

"No, I think not," he said; "but I wished to marry her, and I should not have wished it unless I were very fond of her."

He smiled, as he said it, a bright, kindly smile, and I did not disbelieve him, though I still felt angry. It might be generous and disinterested, but what right had he to come to her with such a question, implying a love which he did not feel? Perhaps I was unnecessarily romantic; but I was glad that Laurette had refused him, and it seemed to me that he would have done her an injury had he married her out of affectionate pity.

What an independent little creature Laurette was! She was in no need of such a sacrifice. How distinctly and steadily she had given her answer! I remembered it now with satisfaction. No, Charleston had no need to pity her; her mind had been made up before she saw him; she had always been secure from him, and was happy in her security.

I went into the hall to bolt the door after Charleston, for it was late, and the servants had gone to bed; and then I took my candle and began to mount the stairs, holding my dress close round me, and treading softly, that I might not disturb Mr. Deane, for I had to pass his door. Then it occurred to me that Laurette, if she were still awake, might like to know that Charleston had received her message. As I paused for a moment at the top of the stairs, it seemed to me that something white fled fast before me along the dark passage. It might be that Laurette had been watching for the sound of his departure. As the thought crossed my mind I passed hurriedly along the corridor, and seeing Laurette's door ajar, pushed it softly open.

She was standing by the window as if she had just turned from it, and she was hiding her face against the wall. The little white figure looked very desolate, standing there in the cold moonlight, and I was about to exclaim, when a sort of sob broke from her, and the low, wailing cry, "O, it is so hard, I cannot; no, I cannot."

Somehow I felt like a traitor, listening to words I was not meant to hear, looking on at trouble in which I knew she would let me have no part, and at the meaning of which I hardly dared to guess; so I slid noiselessly out of the room without being observed by Laurette, who, poor child, was quite absorbed in her own trouble; and it was only when I found myself in the passage that I felt some courage return, and began to be afraid of my past cowardice.

I returned, and this time knocked at the door to attract attention. Laurette was standing just as I had left her, but she turned as I pushed open the door, and looked with displeasure at my intrusion.

"I thought you were gone to bed, Miss Ford," she said, quite in her usual voice, although the tears were still upon her pale cheeks, and her tone said plainly, Why have you come here? I do not want you.

I answered by reproaching her for being still up, for her repellent manner made me afraid of seeking for her confidence.

"It is past twelve o'clock. I only came because I thought you might like to know that I had delivered your message."

"Thank you," she said, and came and sat down in a chair near me. I thought that she was forcing herself to ask no more, and I would gladly have given her comfort if I might, but how could I repeat Charleton's words?

I turned them over again in my mind as the conviction grew stronger within me that it had been a hard struggle to say "no" to him. She had promised, and nothing should make her break her word; she would be true to Edward Finley, and she did not yet perceive that, however she might act, it had now become an impossibility to her. If it had not been for my interview with Charleton, I should not have hesitated to tell her so, but I was proud for her, and after what he had said I could not do it.

"Good-night, Laurette," I said; and then, as it were almost in spite of myself, I made one more opening for her to speak out to me. "What has kept you up so late?"

"My head aches so," she said, coldly drawing herself a little away from me; "it does not matter."

"Poor little thing, she is much too proud," I thought, with a mixture of pity and vexation, but I could say no more.

Mr. Deane did not appear at breakfast the next morning; and he did not come home all day.

In the evening it was in the papers, and every one knew that the firm of Deane & Co. had failed.

As we sat together in the drawing-room after our côte-à-côte dinner, I told Laurette what had happened. She did not cry or make any comments, but she sat still, leaning her head upon her hands and gazing into the fire.

"Poor Uncle Jasper!" she said after a time. "Poor Uncle Jasper, what will he do?"

We sat there silent for an hour or more, awaiting his return. I feared to meet him; his pride must have made the suffering hard to bear.

The night was very still, but the rain was falling steadily, and the wet pavement gleamed in the lamplight. There was a ring. I saw a sudden rush of color to Laurette's pale face; but it was only Charleton. He came in, giving her one compassionate glance as he sat down in his accustomed place, but she did not look up.

"Are you sure that he is coming home to-night?" I said, as the clock struck eleven, and as I spoke the front-door was opened by a latch-key from without. I was trembling so that I could not have stood up, but Laurette rose at once and ran out into the hall. Mr. Deane was passing on into his study, but she went up to him and took his hands.

"How cold and wet you are, dear Uncle Jasper," she said; "come to the fire," and then she drew him into the drawing-room and made him sit down. I can see her now, rubbing his hands in hers, as she knelt before him on the rug. Charleton fetched some wine from the dining-room. Though Mr. Deane said he had dined, we knew well enough that he had eaten nothing that day. He lifted the glass to his lips, and then his hand shook, and he put it down again with a clatter.

"I have ruined you," he said, hoarsely, turning from Laurette.

He had been quite calm and collected all day, Charleton told us afterwards, but now he was unnerved, and not even Laurette had power to comfort him. As he took his candle and walked across the room, I could not help seeing how much he was aged and altered.

IV.

Of course, people were very sorry for Mr. Deane, and for a week or so nothing else was talked of in our Square.

He, poor man, was silent and abstracted when at home, so it was from Charleton that I heard of his plans. The slender means which remained to him were sufficient to enable him to live quietly in the country: he was leaving business, and giving up his house in Belfield Square. I never understood the business part of it, nor how it was that anything remained to him; but I believe some arrangement was made with the creditors, and the other partners of the firm subsequently recovered and carried on the business under another name. As for Mr. Deane, even if he had been able to continue in the firm, I doubt whether he would not have been incapacitated for hard work by the shock he had received. "He has a little property in Surrey," Charleton told me; "he will be happier there."

Then the question arose, What would become of Laurette?

She herself did not seem to have a doubt. Her uncle wished for her, and she would live with him until Edward claimed her. "Poor Edward, it will be a great loss to him; but then one can always wait, you know"; so she said, and I could not bear to shake her happy trust.

We were all sitting at breakfast one morning, when the postman's knock was heard at the door. I had come to dread post-time, of late. The knock brought a cloud over Mr. Deane's face; he pushed away his plate and held out his hand for the letters. There were several business-like-looking envelopes for him, three letters for Charleton, one for me, and one for Laurette.

I saw that she took it a little eagerly, but I did not watch her; I was occupied with my own letter from an old friend in India. As I turned the first closely written sheet I did look up. She was sitting opposite to me; Mr. Deane had walked away to the fireplace, but Charleton was still at the table. As I looked I could not repress an exclamation.

She was even paler than usual, her eyes were full of burning tears, and her hand was clenched upon the letter she held. I knew her well enough to abstain from sympathy or questions; indeed, there was no need for them; I had guessed only too surely what had come to pass.

As she met my look she rose and walked to the window. Charleton swept up his letters and hastily left the room; Mr. Deane followed, and I remained, sitting over my half-emptied cup of tea, uncertain whether to speak or no. I could see that she was struggling with tears as she sat down, hiding her face against the curtain, but one low cry came from her which cut me to the heart.

"My poor child, try to bear it," I said, going up to her. She answered by putting the letter into my hands.

As I read my indignation was almost superseded by surprise. How Edward Finley had contrived to do it in so plausible and gentlemanlike a manner, I never shall be able to understand. He was so completely convinced of the propriety of his own conduct, that, in spite of myself, my angry feelings calmed down, and I grew to regard it as more natural if not excusable. He seemed to take it for granted that, under the circumstances, she would wish to be released from her engagement. Of course, they could not marry for years, and he would not bind her to such a trial.

I remembered Laurette's words, "One can always wait, you know," and the happy, trusting smile with which she had said it, and I grieved for the awakening which had come to her. Yet seeing and understanding its bitterness as I did, I could not yet believe that she had loved him. No; but she had trusted him implicitly, entirely; her one thought and hope had been to bring happiness to his home, and it hurt her sorely to find that she had been deceived.

She had been so proud of him; often and often she had recounted his good deeds, his care for his mother, his kindness to herself; and now it all seemed false and hollow, and she could believe in it no longer. Of course, she was wrong and unjust; he was still a good son and an affectionate cousin; but she had trusted herself to him and he had not kept faith with her, — how could she still believe in him?

Poor little Laurette! I thought about her sadly that day. She had rejected Charleton even whilst she thought he loved her; she had not allowed herself to think of him because she held herself pledged; now she was left, as it were, alone, and I could give her no comfort, knowing, as I did, that she had never had his love.

She said she was tired, and went early to bed that evening. Whilst Mr. Deane and Charleton were still in the dining-room, I went softly up to her room. The candle was put out, but the white moonlight was streaming in at the window and showed me the little white figure sitting up in bed, with her hands clasped round her knees, and her dark tearless eyes wide open.

"What is the matter, Laurette? Cannot you sleep?"

"No, Miss Ford. It is so hard. I feel as if everything were going away. I can never believe in anything again. I would never have given him up. I always thought that he cared, and now it is all so cold," she said; and she shivered and clung to me in her childish way, putting down her head upon my shoulder.

After a time she was somewhat soothed and comforted. I saw her lay her curly head upon the pillow before I would leave her, and then I went down stairs again.

Mr. Deane had heard the whole story, and was full of righteous indignation.

"Poor little thing, is she sleeping?" he asked. "I think I will go and look at her." I thought myself that she was much better left alone, but I did not like to say it, so he took his candle and went up stairs with me.

Laurette was lying fast asleep; her soft curls were tumbled about on the pillows, her lips just parted, her little hand hanging down over the side of the bed. Mr. Deane stood over her with a sad and almost reverent expression upon his face.

"God bless her!" he said, as he turned away, and I saw that a tear had dropped upon the sheet.

Charleton was waiting outside in the passage. There had been something peculiar in his manner all the evening, — a kind of restless impatience quite unusual to him, so that I was not surprised when he said, laying his hand abruptly upon my arm, —

"Miss Ford, can I speak to you alone?"

When we were together in the drawing-room he put a chair for me and stood himself with his back to the fire, but it was some moments before he spoke.

As I looked at him I could not help wishing that it had been otherwise. He was not a superlatively proper young man, like Edward Finley: if his gray eyes were frank they were also somewhat defiant; if his manner was free it was perhaps a little reckless; but there was a truth and force about him of which I felt the attraction. He might be somewhat of a despot, but he would be just and genial in his despotism. Would it not have been better that Laurette should have been in his hands — loving him as I was sure she might have loved him — than that she should become the property of such a man as Edward Finley?

"I believe that I have always loved her," he said at last, breaking the silence. "At least, Miss Ford, I know it now. If she will come to me, I will do all that a man can do. I am going back to America, but I believe that she will trust herself to me."

I did not answer him dryly or indignantly, as I might once have done; for I knew him well enough to believe that it was not vanity which made him say it; but I knew Laurette better, and I was certain that to speak now would be to ruin his chances forever. So I persuaded him for the present to let the matter rest.

"I am going back to America," he said one day, quite carelessly, turning over the newspaper to look for steamers. And I saw that the color flashed across her face and she let her knife fall, but she never said a word. Charleton saw it too, but he gave no sign.

Then, when summer came, the old house in Bel-field Square was empty; we had gone down to Mr. Deane's place in the country; and Charleton had slipped out of our life: he would come once more, he said, to say good by.

It was a pretty little farm-house standing in the midst of Surrey meadows, — meadows with crimson sorrel and yellow buttercups growing amongst the long waving grass. Mr. Deane had become feebler and older, I thought, but he seemed quite happy. He sat basking in the sun, with his newspaper in his hand, or walked slowly round his small domain, inspecting the shrubs; perhaps it was a relief to him to be free from the pressure of business. But Laurette's cheeks did not grow rosy in the country air; she grew paler and more languid. Again she shut herself up from me; she liked best to wander about by herself, and often I found her lying awake in her little white bed during those summer nights.

Then it was that a new apprehension grew up within me. Why did Charleton never write, why did he not come? Perhaps he had again mistaken his feelings; perhaps he would sail, and we should never see him again. Was it not possible that he might already have sailed?

No wonder Laurette grew sadder and paler; she could have waited bravely and patiently, and now there was nothing to wait for except the long parting for life. Tormented as I was by misgivings, how could I speak? and I could not write to Charleton, for I did not know his address.

I was sitting in the little drawing-room one day, when I heard the unusual sound of a firm, manly tread in the passage, and the next moment Charleton stood before me.

I never was more cordial to any one in the whole course of my life. I started up, grasped his hands, and I am not quite sure that I did not kiss him.

"Where is she?" he asked. The next minute he had stepped into the garden, and I was left to my own happy imaginations.

Well! at last happiness had found her. She had waited long, but it had come at last, though not in the shape in which she had looked for it.

I often get letters from her now. They are well and prosperous, and she has a little boy and girl; but somehow I think of her still as she was when I last saw her. The pretty picture in the dingy little vestry is still before my eyes: the joy bells are clanging overhead, the rosy choir-boy is peering round the corner, the clerk is hanging up the surplice, Mr. Deane is in the doorway talking to the clergyman, the sunlight is streaming in through the painted glass window, and the little bride, with her veil thrown back and her dark hair clustering round her forehead, lifts her sweet eyes to her husband, and smiles as she takes the pen from his hand to write her name.

It was the last that I saw of "little Miss Deane." It was hard to part from her, but I felt that she was safe in Charleton's hands. If he was daring he was strong, if he was wilful he was true, and I knew that he loved her. I had been sad for her, and I had rejoiced for her, and there was a blank; but as I sit by my solitary fireside, feeling that age is coming upon me, and that I have no one near who will miss me very much when I am gone, the thought of little Laurette comes across me, with her proud reserve, her passionate griefs, and her pretty, winning ways, and the memory casts a brightness across the dimness of my life.

THE RED NOSE.

In the village of Tattlecombe were many curious persons; and very small matters sufficed to awaken their curiosity. It was generally satisfied at last, either by incontrovertible proof or by ingenious speculation; but there was one puzzle which could not be solved either by a collection of facts or a reduction of theories. Everybody wondered, and nobody knew why Mrs. Murton had a red nose.

Wherever you went you were sure to hear something about Mrs. Murton; you were questioned about her looks; you could not help confessing that she was a very pretty little woman; you had to allow that it was a great pity so pretty a little woman had so red a nose; you were strictly charged to furnish an explanation of the phenomenon; you were, of course, unable; and the village of Tattlecombe remained dissatisfied.

The problem had been submitted to a distinguished mathematician who lived in the neighborhood, who had been very high amongst the wranglers at Cambridge, and who was said to have won problems; and also to the wise woman of the parish, who was supposed to understand the language of the many-twinkling stars, and who could, for a consideration, see looming in the future any kind of husband any silly young woman wished for; but they were both obliged to give it up.

It certainly was no ordinary nose; and thereby hung a tale. Something else hangs thereby in the case of the upper ten thousand savage women; a gold ring or a piece of crystal is with them the hanging ornament; but Mrs. Murton was highly civilized and refined, and as to her nose, it may be truly said that thereby hung a tale.

Now about red noses there are divers theories; and most of them are, according to my judgment and experience, wrong. You very seldom see a red nose, which, upon reflection, not in the looking-glass, but in the mind, does not appear to be the right thing in the right place. So much so, in fact, that if you were to meet a certain person of your acquaintance, and were to miss the usual redness of nose, you would at once say, "My dear So-and-so, you don't look at all well"; and you would be on the point of adding, by way of explanation, "Your nose is quite pale." There is a very prevalent belief that alcohol is at the bottom (or, rather, tip) of every red nose; but I can (on oath, if necessary) declare that one of the reddest noses I ever saw was above the chin of a man who had been from his youth up almost a Rechabite, and to whom the doctor actually recommended a liberal allowance of generous wine, as the best means of toning down the color. For a red nose is a great drawback to a clergyman, whose parishioners look upon it with suspicion; so that the efficacy of his ministrations is impeded by his nasal deformity. Indeed, the more reprobate amongst the boys of his parish lurk in undiscoverable hiding-places, and greet the reverend gentleman with snatches of a comic song called Jolly Nose.

Still, there is a fashion of nose which, with a view to conformity, ought to be red, which properly accompanies a certain complexion, which harmonizes with cheeks, and ears, and hands, which is undoubtedly the right nose in the right place, and which seems more natural and less remarkable than the most natural red hair.

But on none of these grounds was Mrs. Murton's case to be explained. Arethusa was not more unlikely to have had a taste for alcohol; and, moreover, Mrs. Murton's complexion was lovely; her cheeks, and ears, and hands were as delicately tinted as the daintiest blush-rose; and her nose, therefore, seemed quite unnatural, and out of place, so far as the color was concerned, — for in other respects it was perfectly natural, being exquisitely shaped, and unexceptionably situated. Mrs. Murton was the wife of the vicar, a young man who was reputed to be a prodigy of learning, who had greatly distinguished himself at the university, and who had been presented by his college, not long after he took his degree, to the vicarage of Tattlecombe. It was whispered about, moreover, that Mrs. Murton was not unacquainted with awful mysteries; that she had received what very credulous people are pleased to call a superior education; that she could read Latin and Italian with equal ease, that is, with considerable ease; that she was familiar with Greek; that she had even a smattering of Hebrew; that she was versed in ancient history, metaphysics, and theology; and that, stood, even if she seldom put them into practice, the principles of logic.

The vicar and his wife had two little children of very tender years, both girls; and it was remarked that their education and management were left almost entirely to Mrs. Murton, who, if ever the vicar attempted to interfere, would turn upon him with a tartness hardly to be expected from her habitual sweetness, and would say to him sharply, "Pray, allow me to know what is best for girls"; and would accompany her words with an angry flash of the eye, and a glance of deep meaning, which at once silenced the reverend gentleman, and led witnesses to suppose that there was between Mr. and Mrs. Murton some secret which gave her an advantage, whenever she chose to exercise it, over her reverend consort.

Close observation led me to believe that the secret to which Mrs. Murton owed her power was somehow connected with the red nose, and that the red nose was to Mrs. Murton a thorn in the flesh. Many a time, when she had reason to believe she was unnoticed, have I seen her watching it in mirrors and all manner of reflectors; and every time I have remarked that a cloud momentarily passed over her face, and that for a minute or so after her contemplation she was irritable and snappish. But for a long while I could find no one who could read me the riddle, who could solve the puzzle which tortured the gossips of Tattlecombe.

Murder, however, will out; and at last I found somebody who could clear up the mystery which hung over Mrs. Murton's nose.

I fell in, I am happy to say, with the delightful Mrs. Tittle, who herself came from Tattlecombe. Tittle had been a friend of mine from early youth; and so Mrs. Tittle admitted me with more than usual readiness to intimate acquaintance. I soon discovered that she was a woman who was sure to know whatever could be known by close inquiry, keen observation, and acuteness of hearing about all her neighbors' affairs; she even seemed to have a key to the cupboards where many of them kept their private skeletons, and so she was clearly the person who should be able to enlighten me. On a favorable opportunity, therefore, I said to her, "You know Tattlecombe, I believe, Mrs. Tittle?"

"O yes," she answered, "so well! Dear little Tattlecombe! I know every tombstone and graveyard in the pretty churchyard; every green lane for ten miles round; every lovely view in the whole neighborhood; every cow, I verily believe, in the parish; and every queer old gossip in the thatched cottages."

"And I dare say you know the Murtons?" I rejoined.

"The Murtons!" she replied. "Ah! that I do, — so well. Lily Murton, that is Mrs. Murton, who was Lily Bourne, and I were like sisters when we were at school together. But we have not seen much of one another for the last year or so. Do you know them?"

"Slightly. I was lately staying with a friend of mine at Tattlecombe, and I met them several times."

"Is she not a pretty little woman?"

"Very."

"Is it not a pity she has such a dreadfully red nose?"

"A thousand pities! it makes her look like a beautiful peach with a horrid bluish, or a snow-white something with a dirty port-wine stain upon it."

"Ah! poor thing," sighed Mrs. Tittle, looking at the same time rather pleased than otherwise, "she paid dearly for her superior learning."

"Learning!" I exclaimed in astonishment; "does learning give a lady a red nose?"

"It did in her case," replied Mrs. Tittle, laughing.

"Dear me," said I, "was it the Latin or the Greek, or the Hebrew?"

"O, I don't know," she answered, "that it was the dead languages exactly —"

"Perhaps," I broke in, "it was the theology; I knew a theologian with an awfully red nose. Or was it the history? or the metaphysics? or the logic? If she studied nosology, now —"

"I can only tell you," interrupted Mrs. Tittle, "that it was the learning generally."

"Well," I said "I knew that learning resembled alcohol so far as getting into your head is concerned, but I did not know that it carried the resemblance so far as to discolor your nose."

"I will tell you exactly how it happened," said she confidentially. "You must know that Lily was engaged to young Murton when he went up to Oxford. He was very good looking and very clever, and Lily was quite silly about him, though the Bournes generally did n't like him."

"Why not?"

"O, I really hardly know; but they thought him a conceited young prig."

"Hear, hear!" I said.

"Now, you must n't interrupt me," observed Mrs. Tittle, severely, "or I will not tell you my pitiful story. Young Murton, I must tell you, was destined for holy orders; and Lily, who worshipped the clergy in general, was quite ready to worship him in particular. She thought the holy office he was preparing himself for gave him unquestionable authority over her, and she was willing not only to love him (which she could not help), but also to obey him, even before they were married (much more, I suspect, than she obeys him now). Well, he had very prim notions; made Lily quite unhappy by preaching to her about the worldliness and frivolity of her family; and was especially bitter against what he was pleased to call the shallow, flimsy, showy, and even sinful education of young women. So he constituted himself Lily's instructor as well as lover, and insisted upon her taking from him lessons in his horrid Latin, and logic, and things. And as poor little Lily had to keep up her more lady-like accomplishments as well (for her father would not hear of her relinquishing them), she had to work like a galley-slave. And I really do think," continued Mrs. Tittle, looking at me appealingly, "that her father was right; for, though it may be all very well to be just like a man if you are not going to be married, I think that in married life the very diversity of mental culture and attainments tends to prevent unpleasant collision. We wives have often to act towards our husbands the part David acted towards Saul when the evil spirit was upon the son of Kish. But if we had minds trained exactly as our husbands', we should most likely attempt to argue with them, instead of dealing with them by means of enchantments they can appreciate, but can neither practise nor understand. What do you think?"

I, being a bachelor, assented heartily.

"Then, you see," she went on, "if women are to receive the education some even of their own sex would give them, they will have double work to do; for they will have to do the new and not leave the old undone (in case they should ever marry)."

I thought it best to mutter something which might sound like entire agreement.

"To resume, then," said Mrs. Tittle. "Poor little Lily had to work double tides (as they say), and she used, consequently, to read, read, read, both at her meals and directly after them. And in a little while her dear little nose grew red, and by degrees, redder and redder. It was of no use to tell her what was the reason, or for the doctor to assure her that it was a symptom of indigestion, and that there was nothing so likely to impair digestion as reading at and directly after meals; she vowed, with tears in her eyes, that she 'must do the lessons dear George took the trouble to set.' Well, different people, I suppose, have different ways of making love; but Lily's and George's must have been the strangest since that one-eyed person, you know, made love to somebody whose name I think began very appropriately with Gal—but —"

"Polyphemus and Galatea?" I asked.

"I dare say," replied Mrs. Tittle. "Dear little Lily knew all about them; but I don't, though I fancy Handel wrote some music about their love-affair. But let me go on. I assure you I have been staying at the Bournes's when George Murton was there, and he and Lily would remain alone together in the study for hours, and when any of us knocked at the door, and called out to Lily to come into the garden, we very often got no answer, and we could hear George Murton talking angrily about 'accents,' and 'quantities,' and 'long by position,' and all that sort of stuff, and poor little Lily whimpering, 'Yes, yes; I beg your pardon, dear George; I quite forgot.' And if they did come into the garden, they walked up and down sombrely, whilst we played at croquet; and I verily believe he was examining her all the while in some nasty dead language. And he was always lecturing her about Lady Jane Gray and Plato, and exhorting her to set an example to her worldly, frivolous family. After all, I don't think George Murton had done himself much good with all his Hebrew and theology; I am sure his temper was very bad, and many a time I have seen him fling out of the house in an ungovernable rage, leaving Lily sobbing in the study; and when Lily was asked what was the matter, she would say, 'O, George is so angry. I couldn't say my Virgil by heart.' Or, 'Whatever shall I do, I made three false quantities in two lines, and that hurts poor George's feelings more than anything.' Or, 'I couldn't give a proper account of the Manichean heresy, and George says he can't love me.'"

"I wonder she could love him," said I; "I wonder she did n't treat him as Omphale treated Hercules."

"She was infatuated, you should remember," rejoined Mrs. Tittle; "whereas in the case you mention I believe the infatuation was on the side of the gentleman. And there really was some ground for Lily's infatuation. She and her family went once or twice to Oxford, and heard George Murton recite his prize exercises; and Lily's love was mingled with something like the awful fascination exercised by the Veiled Prophet of Khorassan, when she heard the cheers which greeted the repeated time after time in his capacity of prize-man, and when she saw how his good looks became more than beauty under the influence of applause. No wonder she clung to him as to a higher power. Besides, at those visits to Oxford he relaxed a little; and Lily then thought him so kind as well as good and noble, that he completely subjugated her. As for him, I never saw anybody so imperious to another as he was to her; and, though I suppose he really loved her, I believe his love varied directly as her success in doing the papers he set her. I know that he postponed (fancy the gentleman postponing the happy day!) their marriage for three months, until she could satisfy his worship in history and logic; and the logic paper, Lily told me, was the hardest and most repugnant work she ever had to do in her life. At last, they were married; but he had spoiled her beauty forever."

"She does not appear to be in much awe of him now," I remarked.

"No," rejoined Mrs. Tittle, laughing. "You see he gets no prizes now, no distinctions, no acclamations; even his learning is of very little use to him where he is. He is, as a member of ordinary society, quite a commonplace person; and, besides, she is not fearful of losing him now, and she can always twit him with having caused her only personal blemish."

"Ah," I broke in, "not even Socrates could have borne that from Xantippe without wincing."

"I don't know any Saint Tibby," rejoined Mrs. Tittle, looking suspicious; "but I was just going to say that, as for Lily's own learning, it certainly enabled her to marry the man she loved, but she has long since discovered that it is of no further service to her. It is out of place in the circle in which she moves; and, though her reputation for it may do her good with some, it does her harm with others; and, moreover, she has n't time to keep it up, and is forgetting it all in attending to her children and household. All this she feels deeply, and she throws it in the teeth of George Murton. She has found out also that taking holy orders does not necessarily sanctify the taker; and that an ordained sinner is but an unordained sinner with a difference, — especially of necktie."

"But Mr. and Mrs. Murton seem to be tolerably happy together."

"O dear, yes; quite as happy as 'most married couples, if not happier; but the varnish has gone off the gentleman, and the blemish remains on the lady."

"You mean the red nose?"

"Yes. The poor little thing confessed to me that she feels the infiction more than a sensible and Christian woman should feel such a thing. But then she pleads that it is so very peculiar in her case; she has the mortification of knowing that it might have been prevented; and she cannot help seeing that people notice it, or fearing — not without ground, as I know — that they attribute it to a wrong cause. She believed that by altering her habits after she had secured George for better and worse, she would be able at her leisure to get rid of her disfigurement; but one must not trifle with one's digestive organs, which, when they have once been upset, are almost as incapable as Humpty Dumpty of being set up again. She has tried exercise, regular diet, and every kind of pill ever invented for the cure of indigestion; but if she have at all improved her digestive organs (and I should think the contrary is more likely), she has made no even condescended to write (anonymously, of course) to those papers which give advice as to the removal of freckles, tan, redness, &c.; but to no purpose. She has sat for an hour at a time with her feet in cold water, but that obstinate nose refuses to be unreddened, and she remains a warning to all lovely and confiding girls who try, at the expense of their digestions, to secure the affections of pedantic lovers."

Such is the history of Mrs. Murton's red nose; and it causes one to fear that the project which is gaining favor of making girls solidly learned as well as elegantly accomplished may have a baleful effect upon their noses. Let the maids of merry England see to it.

As for men who mourn over their red noses, and would feel hurt by such a remark as one 'bus driver does not scruple to address to another, saying, "This here frosty weather seem to suit you, Tom; that there old beak o' yours is a-colorin' beautiful," they may derive some comfort from the following quotation taken from the works of a popular writer, not of the masculine gender: "He had a fair complexion, a small straight nose — very red, womanish lips, a slightly receding chin, a low forehead, large blue eyes, and light auburn hair. He was rather handsome, and was generally said to have a most prepossessing countenance."

What more could a reasonable man wish for? It should be mentioned, however, that the popular writer's red-nosed man with the prepossessing countenance poisoned his brother and committed bigamy.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE Leader says that Pere Hyacinthe was driven from Paris by the photographers.

THE last comic paper out in London is called Punch and Judy. It is better than Judy, and not as good as Punch.

LA PRINCESSE DE TRÉBIZONDE, M. Offenbach's latest effusion, is to be brought out at the Bouffes Parisiens this month.

BOUCICAULT has been very low with a fever, produced, it is stated, by overwork. The writing of two or three such plays as "Formosa," would give any man a fever.

AN extravaganza written by Sala is to be produced at the Gayety, London, some time in December. The triple was announced last year, but it appears that George Augustus did not come up to time.

SOME curious autographs of Velasquez have lately been discovered in the library of one of the royal palaces in Spain; among them is a receipt for 1,100 riales as payment for his celebrated picture, "The Borrachos."

BARON JAMES DE ROTHSCHILD, the last surviving son of the founder of the house, who died in November last year, left behind him some memoirs, which are now being printed. They consist of a history of the monetary speculations and loans he was engaged in during his lengthened residence in Paris.

THE first number of Mr. Murray's new venture, The Academy, is full of excellent matter for literary and scientific readers of the higher class, but will scarcely please the great public. Matthew Arnold, Professor Huxley, G. A. Simcox, etc. are among the contributors.

MR. DARWIN is preparing a new work, in which the main conclusions arrived at in his "Origin of Species," and accepted by most of the younger naturalists throughout Europe, will be applied to Man.

THE French are crying out for Mr. Kinglake's book on the Crimea. Its circulation was prohibited in consequence of the account of the coup d'état given in the first volume, but this objection no longer exists, as several accounts of the 2d December have appeared since our author's.

THE Athenæum says: "Lifts are called hoists (?) in the United States, and lifts and hoists are vulgar things in common hotels and warehouses for conveying ordinary people, sacks, and casks to upper stories. Lifts have, however, got up in the world, and the Pope by their means now ascends to his apartments in the Vatican."

SWINBURNE, the poet, sends the following complaint to the editor of the Athenæum: "I have but just seen a copy of the edition of Coleridge's Select Poems, arranged in part at my suggestion, and preceded by a short essay of my writing. I hasten to disavow all knowledge of a note inserted at page 150 without leave or warning. The writer of that note introduces Coleridge's 'Lesson for a Boy' in ancient metres, with this ingenuous and pertinent remark: 'There is something very touching in this little lesson as read by the light of the after fate of Derwent Coleridge' (sic). What on earth the writer means he knows, I presume, himself; but to me, who know nothing of this intrusive bit of tenderness, it appears a sample of blundering impertinence, with which I am not willing that my name, appearing as it does on the title-page of the book, should remain saddled. For the rest, the Rev. Derwent Coleridge needs not the thanks, but must retain the gratitude of the students for whom his admirable edition of his illustrious father's complete poems has thrown fresh light on that great master's work, and whom he has enabled to date the birth and trace the growth of those imperishable poems. A. C. SWINBURNE."

PROFESSOR HENRY MORLEY, some time since, had the rare luck to find an unpublished poem by "Mr. John Milton." He found it in the British Museum, in a copy of the edition of Milton's English and Latin poems, printed in 1645. The attention of the literary world is now called to another discovery at the British Museum, namely, a poem supposed to have been written by "Mr. William Shakespeare." It is in a translation of Montaigne's Essays, by John Florio, dated 1603. In accordance with the usual custom of that time, verses in praise of the book are prefixed; of these there are about ninety written by the poet, Samuel Daniel, who signs himself "One of the Gentlemen Extraordinaire of her Majesties Most Royall Privi Chamber." Following these verses of Daniel's is a sonnet, without signature or other mark, entitled, "Concerning the Honor of Books," and is as follows:—

"Since Honor from the Honorer proceeds,
How well do they deserve that memorie
And leave in bookes for all posterities
The names of worthies, and their vertuous deedes
When all their glorie els, like water weedes
Without their element, presently dyes,
And all their greatnes quite forgotten lyes:
And when, and how they florish no man heedes.
How poor remembrances are Statutes Toomes
And other monuments that men erect
To Princes, which remaine in closed rooms
Where but a few behold them; in respect
Of Bookes, that to the Universall eye

AN UNSUBJECTED WOMAN.

MRS. ELIZABETH CARTER died an unmarried lady aged eighty-nine in the year 1806. She was eldest daughter of the Rev. Nicholas Carter, D. D., perpetual curate of the chapel at Deal, afterwards rector of Woodchurch and of Ham, and one of the six preachers in Canterbury Cathedral. Dr. Carter was the son of a rich grazier in the vale of Aylesbury, and in his boyhood had looked forward to a milky way of life; but was sent rather late to Cambridge, where he became hopelessly addicted to Greek, Latin, and Hebrew. He therefore took orders in the Church, and produced, instead of tubs of butter, tracts on controversial theology. Elizabeth was his first child by his first wife; but he married twice, and had a variety of sons and daughters, who were all reared on a diet of Greek, Latin, and Hebrew.

Little Betsey, in her nursery days, did not take kindly to her father's way of dieting his children on dead languages. She suffered so much intellectual congestion from them that she became, as a girl, afflicted with frequent and severe headaches which were the plague of all her after life. When a young lady she took to snuff to keep herself awake over her studies, and relieve her head. For the rest of her life she was a snuff-taker. Mrs. Carter was not one of the true blue-stockings, for the characteristic of their coterie was not the possession but the affectation of much learning. Her early training bent her life in a particular direction, but in that direction she grew vigorously.

Elizabeth Carter in her youth learnt French by being sent to board for a year in the house of a French refugee minister; she gave all the time required of our grandmothers to "the various branches of needlework," and with much pains learnt to spoil music with the spinet and German flute. She had been most assiduously trained in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew; in these studies she succeeded best, and especially she took to Greek, which became a living tongue to her, and which she conquered without help of such Greek grammars as were then in use. Dr. Johnson said, in compliment of a celebrated scholar, that he understood Greek better than any one he had ever known except Elizabeth Carter. Like other young ladies Betsey Carter wrote verse, and at the age of twenty-one she published a very small collection of poems, with a Greek motto from Euripides, signifying that they were nothing. She liked the morality of Mrs. Rowe's letters, which are still to be found lying neglected on old bookstalls, and wrote on the occasion of her death, that it would be her own justest pride,

"My best attempt for fame,
That joins my own to Philomela's name,"

Philomela being Mrs. Rowe. She admired also the poetry of Stephen Duck, the thresher, patronized and pensioned by the Queen of George the Second, and addressed him in lines which begin "Accept, O Duck, the Muse's grateful lay."

When about twenty years old there was some prospect of a place at Court for her if she understood the German of the reigning family. She learnt German on this hint, but did not go to Court, and for many years saw London life only when visiting among her relations. Afterwards she learnt Spanish and Italian, some Portuguese, and even Arabic, making for herself an Arabic Dictionary. She had a taste also for geography, ancient of course, knowing a great deal more of the geography of Greece B. C. 1184, than of Middlesex in her own time. But with all her work she had passed a youth not without playfulness, and she was throughout life heartily and cheerfully religious with a wholesome disrelish of controversy, wherein she was wiser than her father.

Surely, the doctor's influence would have sufficed to keep her zeal for study within wholesome bounds. She was throughout life an early riser, considering herself to be up late if she was only up by seven. Her common time of rising was between four and five. Early to rise comes well enough after early to bed; but we have Dr. Carter praising his daughter in her girlhood for a virtuous resolution not to study beyond midnight. The only stand he made was against her use of snuff to keep herself awake and abate headache. When she was the worse for the want of it, he let her have it; his protest failed against the snuff, and was not made against the overwork that made snuff necessary: and not snuff only. Poor little Betsey Carter used also to keep herself awake for night study by binding a wet towel round her head putting a wet cloth to the pit of her stomach, and chewing green tea and coffee. Be it observed, nevertheless, that she did not kill herself. She lived to the age of eighty-nine. But her headaches were the penalty inflicted on her for abridging hours of sleep.

Now, it is not just to the body to overcome its fatigues habitually with snuff in the nose, green tea leaves in the mouth, a wet towel round the head, and a wet cloth at the pit of the stomach. But against all that was here to be set a placidly cheerful temper and a mind well occupied. Elizabeth

Carter in her youth could get through nine hours' dancing with enjoyment, and walk to it three miles and back in a gale of wind. She studied astronomy, but had not a soul above shirt buttons and made her brother's shirts.

It was suspected that her love of study had produced a secret resolution against marriage. She said, indeed, at eighty-six, "Nobody knows what may happen. I never said I would not marry"; and among offers refused in her youth was one that tempted her enough to make her hesitate while her friends urged acceptance. If he had not furnished evidence against himself by publishing a few rather licentious verses, Elizabeth would probably have taken to this suitor's shirt-buttons, and had a livelier first-born than her translation of Epictetus. When she was sixty-five years old, Hayley dedicated his Essay on Old Maids to Mrs. Elizabeth Carter, as "Poet, Philosopher, and Old Maid," an attention which she did not gratefully appreciate, because she disliked the temper of his essay. Perhaps she was too fastidious. Punch himself was in awe of her. She was not above going to a puppet-show, but when she went to one at Deal, "Why, Punch," said the showman, "what makes you so stupid?" "I can't talk my own talk," said Punch. "The famous Mrs. Carter is here."

And how had the lady become famous? Thus: Edward Cave, of the Gentleman's Magazine, being an old friend of her father's, admitted into his magazine occasional bits of verse from her, signed Eliza. The first appeared before she was quite seventeen years old. Through Cave she made the acquaintance of young Samuel Johnson upon his first coming to London. Two or three months after his first contribution to Cave's magazine had appeared, — it was a Latin aleaic ode, — Dr. Carter replied from the country to his daughter's letter from town, "You mention Johnson; but this is a name with which I am utterly unacquainted. Neither his scholastic, critical, nor poetical character ever reached my ears." Johnson was then aged nine-and-twenty and Miss Carter twenty-one. It was in Cave's shop, as fellow-contributor to the Gentleman's Magazine, before either of them had tasted fame, that the acquaintanceship began to which Elizabeth Carter owes much of her fame. Writing to her eighteen or twenty years after the beginning of their cordial but ceremonious friendship, Johnson said, "To every joy is appended a sorrow. The name of Miss Carter introduces the memory of Cave. Poor dear Cave! I owed him much; for to him I owe that I have known you"; and he subscribed himself her most obedient and most humble servant, "with respect, which I neither owe nor pay to any other." At the age of twenty-two Miss Carter had translated out of French the criticism of De Croussaz upon Pope's Essay on Man, and immediately afterwards translated also for Cave, from the Italian of Algarotti, six dialogues for the use of ladies upon Newton's philosophy of light and color. Samuel Johnson, then at work for Cave corrected the proofs for the young lady, of whom the learned Doctor Thomas Birch then made a note, which showed that she already seemed to be upon the way to fame. "This lady," said Dr. Birch, in noting her bit of translation, "is a very extraordinary phenomenon in the republic of letters, and justly to be ranked with the Sulpitias of the ancients and the Schurmanns and the Daciers of the moderns. For to an uncommon vivacity and delicacy of genius, and an accuracy of judgment worthy the maturest years, she has added the knowledge of the ancient and modern languages at an age when an equal skill in any one of them would be a distinction in a person of the other sex."

A learned woman was a marvel in those days, and her place in creation yet unsettled. Already there cropped up in connection with Miss Carter, when she was little more than a girl, the sublime idea, not merely that she was fit to be an elector of M. P.s, but that she was competent to be one. "Here 's all Deal," wrote one of her sisters to her, "is in amazement that you want to be a Member of the Parliament House; and Mrs. Blank, was told it, but so strongly affirmed that it was no such thing, that she came to our house quite eager to ask, and was quite amazed to hear 't was so. Let me know in your next whether 't is a jest, or that you really want to go."

Her scholarship and knowledge of modern languages must have attracted a good deal of general attention, for Miss Carter was hailed as a sister prodigy by the marvellous youth John Philip Baratie, who was about four years younger than herself. Of Baratie it is said that, when four years old, he talked with his mother in French, with his father in Latin, and with the servants in German. He read Greek at the age of six, Hebrew at eight, and translated Benjamin of Tudela's travels out of Hebrew into French when a boy of eleven. When he was but fourteen years old, the University of Halle conferred on him the degree of Master of Arts, and he astonished crowded audiences by his disputations upon fourteen theses. He died of consumption before he had attained the age of twenty, and it was in the last year or two of his life that he heard of the learned English damsel, Elizabeth Carter. He then opened a correspondence, in which he praised her as one whose Latin verse the Romans of the Augustan age would have taken for that of the swan of Mantua, or of a Latin Sappho.

While corresponding with Baratie, Miss Carter formed a more abiding friendship with Miss Catherine Talbot, a bishop's granddaughter, who lived with her widowed mother in the family of Dr. Secker, then Bishop of Oxford, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury; Dr. Secker gratefully remembering that he was indebted to her family for his first steps of promotion in the church. Through her friend Catherine Talbot, Miss Carter obtained the friendship of Dr. Secker, which was so emphatically shown, that when the archbishop became a widower the London world assigned to him Elizabeth Carter for a second wife. But some there were who gave her to Dr. Hayter, Bishop of London. "Brother Hayter," the archbishop said one day, "the world has it that one of us two is to marry Madam Carter; now I have no such intention, and therefore resign her to you." "I will not pay your Grace the same compliment," replied the bishop. "The world does me much honor by the report."

So as Deal had held that Elizabeth Carter was the woman to have a seat in the House of Commons, London believed her place to be among the bishops. Or among the players. For when Edward Moore's play of the Gamster came out, it was held to be so highly judicious and moral, that it was at first attributed to Mrs. Carter. Moore wrote also Fables for the Female Sex, which were not less worthy of one who might be assigned as bride to an archbishop. But among he-writers of that day the true primate of the female world was Samuel Richardson; and Richardson embalmed a characteristic piece of Elizabeth Carter's verse, her Ode to Wisdom, in his Clarissa. He had not been able to find out the author of the ode, and had, therefore, republished it in his novel (in the first edition part of it only) without consent; for which, though he had done honor thereto by engraving it and giving it with music, he was called to order by the lady. He replied with extreme courtesy, as one who "would sooner be thought unjust or ungenerous by any lady in the world than by the author of the Ode to Wisdom."

When at home with her father in the parsonage at Deal, Miss Carter had a bell at the head of her bed, pulled by a string which went through a chink in her window, down into the sexton's garden. The sexton, who got up between four and five, made it his first duty to toll this bell lustily. "Some evil-minded people of my acquaintance," she wrote to a friend, "have most wickedly threatened to cut my bell-rope, which would be the utter undoing of me, for I should infallibly sleep out the whole summer." Up thus betimes, she went to work as a schoolboy to his lessons, and thence to the ramble before breakfast over sunny commons, or through dewy cornfields, or the brambles of the narrow lane, pulling sometimes a friend out of bed to be companion of the walk, and respectfully noted by the country folks as "Parson Carter's daughter." Then home, and "when I have made myself fit to appear among human creatures we go to breakfast, and are extremely chatty; and this and tea in the afternoon are the most sociable and delightful parts of the day. We have a great variety of topics in which everybody bears a part, till we get insensibly upon books; and whenever we go beyond Latin and French, my sister and the rest walk off, and leave my father and me to finish the discourse and the teakettle by ourselves, which we should infallibly do, if it held as much as Solomon's molten sea." Her work in later life was mainly to keep fresh the fruits of early study. Her headaches had to be considered, and her book-work was done with rests every half-hour, and rambles off to water her pinks and roses, or to gossip a few minutes with any friend or relation who was in the house. But she read every day before breakfast two chapters of the Bible, and a sermon, besides some Hebrew, Greek, and Latin; and after breakfast, or at some other time of the day, a little of every modern language she had learnt, in order to keep her knowledge of it from rusting.

When she began her translation of Epictetus, at the wish of her friends, Dr. Secker and Catherine Talbot, Elizabeth Carter was helping her father by taking the sole charge of the education of her youngest brother, whom she sent up to Cambridge so well prepared that he astonished much the examiners, who asked at what school he had been educated, with the reply that his only teacher was his eldest sister. Miss Carter's translation of Epictetus was not begun with a view to publication, but when it was done, and revised by Dr. Secker, there was publication in view, and she was told that a life of Epictetus must be written. Her reply to Miss Talbot will astonish those who connect learning in women with want of shirt-buttons among men. She said, "Whoever that somebody or other is who is to write the life of Epictetus, seeing I have a dozen shirts to make, I do opine, dear Miss Talbot, that it cannot be I." It was urged on her also that she must add notes to Christianize the book of the heathen philosopher, and prevent "danger to superficial readers." She did all that was urged on her, at the same time that she was finishing the preparation of her brother's back and brains for college.

The book appeared in seventeen fifty-eight, and there were more than a thousand subscribers for it. By way of compliment, more copies were subscribed for than were claimed, and the lady earned by this labor a thousand pounds. The book, also, when published, was maintained in good repute. Some years afterwards her friend, Dr. Secker, brought her a bookseller's catalogue, and said, "Here, Madam Carter, see how ill I am used by the world. Here are my sermons selling at half-price, while your Epictetus is not to be had under eighteen shillings, only three shillings less than the original subscription." Such a work from a woman was a thing to be talked of in Europe, as the world then went. An account of the learned lady was published even in Russia, where, as Miss Carter said, they were just learning to walk on their hind legs.

Four years later appeared Miss Carter's poems, in a little volume dedicated to the Earl of Bath; and she was now able to have a lodging of her own in London, — a room on a first floor in Clarges Street, — whence she was always fetched out to dinner by the chairs or carriages of her many friends. Her brothers and sisters had grown up and been put out in the world; her father's second wife was dead, and he was moving about at Deal from one hired house to another. Elizabeth then bought herself a house by the Deal shore, took her father for its tenant, and lived there with him until his death, he working in his library, and she in hers, with the annual treat of a visit to London.

The nautical world of Deal, impressed by her erudition, held that she had done something in mathematics which had puzzled all the naval officers. She had foretold a storm, and some were not at all sure that she could not raise one. A young man remarked to a verger's wife in Canterbury Cathedral that it was very cold. "Yes," she said, "and it will be a dreadful winter, and a great scarcity of corn; for the famous Miss Carter has foretold it." While her house at Deal was being settled (she had bought two small houses and was turning them into one), Madam Carter took a tour upon the Continent in company with the Queen of the Blue Stockings, Mrs. Montagu, and the Earl of Bath, who died in the next year rather suddenly, and did not, as her friends had thought he would, bequeath her an annuity. The bulk of his property went to his only surviving brother, who died three years later, and the next heir then, delicately professing that it was to fulfil Lord Bath's intentions, secured to Miss Carter an annuity of a hundred pounds during her life, which, towards the close of her life, was increased to a hundred and fifty. The annuity came to Miss Carter in seventeen sixty-seven, and a couple of years earlier she had received a like annuity from Mrs. Montagu, who then, by her husband's death, obtained the whole disposal of his fortune. An uncle of Miss Carter's, who was a silk-mercator, had also died and left fourteen thousand pounds to Dr. Carter and his children, of which Elizabeth's share was fifteen hundred in her father's lifetime. In later years an annuity of forty pounds came to Miss Carter from another friend. She was rich, therefore, beyond her needs; for she lived inexpensively, and had money to spare for struggling relations, and for those of the poor whose griefs she saw. When left alone in the Deal house, she kept up a healthy hospitality with tea and rubbers of whist for threepenny points; was a neat, cheerful old woman, simply dressed and scrupulously clean, before her time in knowledge of the value of a free use of cold water, fond of her tea and her snuff, and never worrying her country friends with ostentation of her learning.

The headaches at last almost put an end to study. Mrs. Carter read Fanny Burney's novels with enjoyment, delighted in Mrs. Radcliffe's, objected to the morality of Charlotte Smith's, and thought there was more of Shakespeare in Joanna Baillie than in any writer since his time. That was because she had a strong prejudice on behalf of female writers at a time when women were only beginning to find their way into the broad space they now occupy in English literature. She thought much less of Burns than of Joanna Baillie, because Miss Baillie was always proper, and Burns was in some places anything but ladylike. Though living at Deal, she refused to buy there any article which, by its cheapness or otherwise, she could suspect to have been smuggled. But her reason for this, given to Mrs. Montagu, was a generous one.

"I cannot help pitying these poor ignorant people, brought up from their infancy to this wretched trade, and taught by the example of their superiors to think there can be no great harm in it, when they every day see the families of both hereditary and delegated legislators loading their coaches with contraband goods. Surely in people whom Heaven has blessed with honors and fortune and lucrative employments of government, the fault is much greater than that of the poor creatures whom they thus encourage?" She was a kindly old woman, whose gentle, courteous manner won the hearts of servants in the houses that she visited. One lady ascribed some of the excellence of her own servants to Mrs. Carter's influence upon them; for she was often mindful of the hearts and heads and open ears of servants behind the chairs at dinner, in a way that made her direct conversation into a form that would insure their carrying away some wholesome thoughts from their attendance.

Now this, faithful in small things, was a good womanly life, although the life of a lady given to Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, and much other erudition, a lady high in honor at the original blue-stocking assemblies, and one who could be truly described as a snuffy old maid. That description of her would be true, but not exhaustive. She had a woman's religiousness devoid of theologic spite; a woman's social vivacity of speech, with a disrelish of uncharitable comment and flippant bitterness which went far to suppress that form of conversation in her presence. She cheered her family and eased her father's labor and cost in the rearing of his younger children. She blended the writing of an essay upon Epictetus with the making of a set of shirts. Without distinguished genius, by industry with love of knowledge and a calm adherence to her sense of right, she passed into an old age honored with affectionate respect from people of all ranks of life and all degrees of intellect. Looking back at her, out of our century into hers, we may find that many of her ways and notions were old-fashioned; but in the good fashion that never grows old, she was a woman unspoilt by her learning; and the less likely to be spoilt because it was true learning, the result of steady work.

WAS SHE WORTH IT?

I. THE ASSEMBLY-ROOMS OF BARNCOTE IN 1847.

THE Upper Ten Thousand of Barncote are gathered together at one of their monthly assemblies. It is the 31st of December, and in consequence, the ball is a more brilliant and "dressy" affair than usual. As a rule, the Barncotians, in those days, set their faces against any sumptuary extravagance, and the monthly assemblies usually entailed on Paterfamilias only the expense of a few yards of ribbon and a bit of white muslin.

This is an exceptional occasion; the officers from the barracks are present en masse, and, by special request, in uniform; the band of the 4th Bays is also in attendance, and relieves the cornet-a-piston and three fiddles with a strident galop or rattling polka. The female Barncotians were arrayed in great splendor, and in all the bravery of diaphanous muslins, shimmering satins, and other millinery properties. The black coats present were rather at a discount; not that the young ladies were not fully aware of the temporary character of a flirtation with the "Bays," and the much higher chances of a satisfactory settlement with the young native lawyers, brewers, maltsters; but that, round dances not having been long in vogue in the county, the natives, as a rule, could not or would not dance them; so that when the brass band struck up a lively polka, there was a general move on the part of the civilians to the card-rooms adjoining for a little loo.

There were two card-rooms, one leading out of the other. In the first were a couple of whist-tables. At one of these sat Colonel Poyser of the Bays, a gray-haired old soldier; Callum, the Barncote brewer; Mrs. Poyser, the colonel's wife, a clever meek old lady, whose silver hair was done up in rolls on the top of her head; and Lady Whittaker, the relict of a city grandee. Leaning over her father's shoulder, her curls getting in the old man's way as he sorted his cards, and causing him to puff and snort, and wave his hands impatiently in the air, stood Lucy Callum, as fair a vision as ever maddened the heart of a susceptible Barncotian.

Sweet Lucy Callum, pen and ink can't picture thy charms, dear fair Saxon maiden! That her hair was nut-brown, — not shot with gold or tinged with red, but of the extinct good old-fashioned russet brown; that her skin was as fair and pure as the white lip of a sea-shell, tinged with the hue of youth and health, and her rosy lips, just parted, showed the dearest little teeth in the world; that her eyes were of a deep lucid gray, fringed with long lashes a shade darker than her hair: to tell you all this is only waste of time; you would fail to realize the sweetness of Lucy Callum. And yet I wish I could paint her for you. She is of a type of womanhood now extinct, of a simpler, easier world, of a more quiet and faithful time. Forty-seven, ah me, since then, the world has changed from an old respectable, staid, and proper world to a raddled old harridan dancing the Cancan!

There stood by the vicar's wife at the second card-table, pretending to look over her cards, but in reality drawing long draughts of love from the contemplation of Lucy Callum, a young and handsome fellow of some twenty years of age. This was Tom Bellamy, a distant relative and ward of John Callum, the brewer.

The entrance of the young men from the ball-room disturbed the whist-players, and the game was suspended for a moment, as they passed through into the inner room.

Colonel Poyser looked anxiously from under his bushy eyebrows, but none of his youngsters were of the party; only Captain Prodder and Major Bond, who could take care of themselves. The Bays was a quiet, gentlemanly regiment, and old Poyser was like a father to his youngsters, and kept them away as far as he could from the temptations of unlimited loo. Whist the old man encouraged, and did n't mind what the points were, but "those gambling games" he set his face against most sternly.

Tom Bellamy made a move as though to pass between the red curtains into the inner room. Callum looked up over his gold eye-glasses: "No loo to-night, Tom?"

"Well, I'll just take a hand, uncle," said Tom carelessly.

Old Callum was wonderfully fond of a little quiet gambling himself, and report said that at the private card-club at the White Hart a thousand or two would sometimes change hands on a single night; report said also that the change had frequently been unfavorable to Mr. Callum. His nephew therefore felt as though Satan were reproving sin, when his uncle (titular: he was only a distant cousin really) admonished him for losing twenty pounds or so at loo.

But Lucy left her father's side, and took Tom by the arm: "Dance this polka with me, Tom. I've refused half a dozen, to keep a dance for you, and then you've never asked me once."

"Well, you know," said Tom, "I ain't much good at the polka; and as for asking you, there's been no getting near you all the evening, for these soldier fellows."

You see Tom, though tremendously in love, was but a young cub. A long-legged young cornet here entered, and carried off Miss Callum. Tom had missed his chance, and was as sulky as a bear. He walked into the next room. Some sweet little cherub, however, sitting up aloft, had determined that Tom should not drop his money that night. Young Winter, a cool and cautious hand, who never continued playing when the cards were against him, and who, having been twice loosed for five pounds, had resigned his seat, on the pretence of going to find a partner for the Lancers, — young Winter caught hold of Tom by the arm: "Come with me, Tom; I have something to say to you of importance."

Archibald Winter was a few years older than his friend. He was now a junior partner in the firm of Winter, Boothby, and Winter, Solicitors, of Pump Street. His female friends called him ugly. He was short and thick-set; his dark hair hung down to the velvet collar of his coat: a projecting forehead and heavy brows shadowed a pair of keen and piercing eyes. He was not prepossessing, but powerful looking. Not popular with the youth of Barncoote, he was reputed "near," and a keen hand; but he did n't consort much with young men, and the only friend he had was Tom Bellamy.

"I want to have a long talk with you, Tommy; and we'll go across to the billiard-room, and have a smoke: there'll be nobody there to-night, and the marker's got a holiday, so we'll have a quiet chat all to ourselves."

Tom walked out rather unwillingly; he did n't like leaving the game in the hands of the long-legged cornet, although he did n't know how to play his cards when he had them.

The billiard-room was a subscription affair. It was on the ground-floor of a house, the upper rooms of which were occupied for offices. A deaf old woman lived in the basement, and looked after the rooms. Winter closed the outside door, and bolted the latch. There was a good fire burning in the room; he turned up the gas, and pulled off the linen cover of the table: "Tom, I'll play you a level fifty, and take eight to five in half-crowns."

You see Archibald was a canny youth, and liked to be paid for his time even when counselling a friend.

"I can't do it, Archie; but I suppose I must try."

Winter gave a miss in balk, and Tom twisted in off the spot, brought the red over the middle pocket, scored up to forty, and muffed a cannon a baby could n't have missed. Tom made a face, and looked at the end of his cue.

"It is n't chalk that's wanting, it's caution," said Winter, proceeding to make half a dozen easy little cannons; and then holding the red, and finding his opponent under the cushion, he gave another safe miss; and Tom failing to get in again, he won the game in a succession of easy breaks.

"Trouble you for a sov., Tommy. And now, let's sit down, and have a chat and a pipe. Tommy, you'll be of age in a week."

"Did you bring me here to tell me that?" said Tom sulkily. The loss of his loo, of his Lucy, and of his sovereign had rather soured the youth's temper.

"Now, Tom, I want to know what you're going to do?"

"As to what?"

"As to making a start in the world."

"Well, that's pretty well decided for me. I'm to go into my uncle's business."

"What! brewing?"

"Yes."

"Then why did your uncle incur the expense of making you a scientific farmer?"

"Five years ago, when I went to old Scramble to learn farming, my uncle did n't intend to make me a brewer."

"Oh! two years ago, then, when you went to Barber, to learn surveying and agency-work?"

"Two years ago, my uncle told me he could n't take me into his business."

"Ah! Then how is it the old chap has changed his mind?"

"He told me this morning. He has had such good accounts of me that he thinks he shall be safe in taking me into the business."

Winter grinned. He got up and opened the door, looked out into the passage, closed the door carefully, sat down, and whispered, "Do you believe him?"

"Why should n't I?"

"Look here, Tommy. Five years ago your uncle was a rich man, and the brewery bringing him a fortune. Two years ago, the brewery was flourishing, and your uncle firm on his legs. Now, — listen, Tommy — he is n't worth a penny!"

Tom jumped on to his feet as white as a sheet: "Nonsense, Archie!"

"I know it, Tommy. He's lost five thousand each year for the last two years on the hop-duty.*

* In 1847 there was a duty on hops, and large sums were wasted on the probable amount.

He's been buying up hops for a rise for the last two years, and they've been going down ever since. He's lost fifty thou. at least by that, and he's been going on awful at loo too. I tell you, Tom, and I know it, he can't hold out another six months. It is Birkin's bank that keeps him up; he owes them so much they're afraid to stop him. Where's your five thousand, Tommy?"

"In consols, I know; he told me so."

"He told you so," said Winter scornfully. "Look here; unless you act at once, that'll go too, if it has n't gone already."

"That can't be, Winter. Birkin, the banker, is the other trustee, and the stock could n't be sold without his sanction."

"Well, you're so far right. If you insist on having the stock transferred to you when you come of age, they'll find either the stock or the cash. But, Tommy, boy, keep it out of your uncle's clutches, or you'll lose it all, — stock, loo, and barrel. Now, look here, old fellow; Lord Theynam was at our office to-day."

"Well, what of that?"

"He came to ask the governor — you know we are his local solicitors — if he knew of a clever young fellow to take his agency here. He's going to pension off old Birks. The salary ain't much, — one hundred and fifty pounds a year, — but it's fair to start with. His head man, you know, gets twelve hundred pounds a year. The governor called me in; and I mentioned your name, and his lordship knew it at once; said your father had been of great service to him; and, in fact, he'd have sent for you then and there, but I told him you weren't in the town; and he's coming in again on Saturday."

"I don't care much about lords," said Tom ungraciously, "and I'd rather not be a flunky."

"Dash it, man! the money don't smell. Tommy, my dear old boy, here are two roads in life: one leads to a competency and a sure and respectable position in life; the other, to bankruptcy, ruin, death! Tell me now, before you go, you'll ask Lord Theynam for this agency?"

Tom took up a cue and began knocking the balls about. Just at the moment, the band in the assembly-room struck up. The band and the dancers had come in refreshed from supper. It was a joyous gallop, and the quick beat of eager feet shook the room in which they stood.

Tom caught the impulse of the moment. "Come along, Archie; let's look up some partners. I'll see you about business in the morning."

Winter followed with a grunt of dissatisfaction.

Pretty Lucy was very angry with Tom for playing truant, and would hardly speak to him till the party broke up. It was a lovely night, the full moon throwing a golden band of light over the rippling waves; each tiny ripple, as it sped on to the shore, carried the glory with it, and shattered it on the shingle. The beat of the waves seemed to make a harmony with the beat of two human hearts. Anyhow, before they reached No. 1 Montgolfier Terrace, Tommy and Lucy had made it up.

II. NO. 1 MONTGOLFIER TERRACE IN 1847.

Tom Bellamy found his way to his uncle's house as soon as he decently could, on the morning after the ball. He wanted to assure himself that the episode of the night before was n't only a delightful morning wrapper, looking pale and sorrowful, his heart gave a mighty throb as he thought: "She has changed her mind!" But Lucy set his fears at rest, nestling in his arms for a moment, and allowing him to take two or three little kisses. But she looked up into his face with such wistful eyes: "O Tom, poor papa is so ill!"

"Why, what's the matter? He looked so well last night."

"Yes; but he was taken ill this morning; the doctor says it's paralysis; he has been insensible for a long time, and Dr. James says — O poor papa!" And here Miss Lucy broke down, and sobbed her heart out against Tom's waistcoat.

Tom didn't know exactly how to comfort her. He was fond of his uncle, and shocked at the idea of his death; but he could n't hit on anything likely to console his sweetheart. "These trials, you know," he began — "it's all for the best, dear: there's a brighter world." And then it struck him that a world without short whist, unlimited loo, old port, and brandy and water, however bright it might be, would n't suit the old gentleman; and so he took to kissing the poor damp salt cheeks that were turned up to him for sympathy; and by and by the great soft-hearted boy began to blubber too; and that seemed to do her good, for she stopped crying, and began to comfort Tom, stroking his hair off his forehead, and calling him all sorts of pet names; and then, when Tom had mopped himself up, and was thinking what a great booby he was, she ran away to look after her papa.

After a while she came back. "He's sensible now, and asking for you." Tom crept up stairs, and stood by his uncle's bedside. The old man had the mark of death on him. "Tom," he whispered in a hoarse voice that seemed to come from a long way off, — "Tom, look after Lucy, and stick to the business, for better or worse."

"By God's assistance, I will!"

You see Tom's feelings had been wrought up a good deal, especially seeing that he was thinking more of Lucy than the business, which the old man had coupled with her.

The dying man took Tom's hand and pressed it; it was n't the sort of hand-clasp that a father would give who has just bestowed a beautiful daughter and a large fortune on a suitor, but an appealing, clinging, deprecating squeeze; at least so Tom felt it; and perhaps he was right.

Well, John Callum died and was buried; and after the funeral came the reading of the will. It happened also that the day of the funeral was Tom Bellamy's birthday. The will was dated a week before the old man's death. It was short and to the purpose. He bequeathed everything of which he died possessed, after paying his just debts and funeral expenses, to his daughter, and appointed Thomas Bellamy sole trustee and executor. It was his wish, he had added to his will, that his daughter should marry his ward and kinsman, if, as he believed, there was a mutual attachment between them; but in any case he was satisfied to intrust his daughter's welfare to Thomas Bellamy. There were present at the reading of the will, Winter, father and son (the former officiating); Mrs. Drux, Callum's widowed sister; old Birkin, the banker; Lucy and Tom. As nobody except the two lovers had any expectations from the will, there was a general grunt of approval. Winter, having folded up the will, looked round on the company, and said, when I inform you that there is — ahem — every prospect that our esteemed and — ahem — departed friend's wishes will be fulfilled. On this — ahem — sad and — ahem — trying occasion, it is perhaps not — ahem — seemly to enter into — ahem — congratulatory matter, but we all wish 'em well, and God bless 'em."

Lucy came over to Tom's side, and put her hand into his. It was a pretty little hand; and Tom, who did n't know exactly what to do with it, had almost made up his mind to have another cry, — he was a soft-hearted fellow, and his heart was very full, — when he caught sight of Archibald Winter's face in the pier-glass. It was so wild-looking and livid, that he hardly recognized it as his friend's. He turned quickly round; but Archie had recovered himself, although he was still white in the face. This little incident quite put Tom into spirits. His love-affair had been almost too quietly and quickly arranged; but to find that there was a jealous rival in the field, and that rival his best friend, why, it was quite thrilling; and now, too, he remembered the conversation of the other night. "So that was your little game, Master Archie, was it, to put me off the scent, eh?" said Tom to himself; and he began to fancy that he should find his uncle's affairs in better order than that sly fox had led him to expect. I don't think he was a bit angry with his friend, but rather flattered and proud at the tribute paid to the value of the prize he had secured so easily.

The guests went out; the banker, taking young Tom by the hand, whispered, "Call at the bank tomorrow, Tom, about eleven."

Tom and Lucy and Mrs. Drux sat over the fire to talk about the future. Tom, you see, was master of the house now, and of all within it, of the big brewery in Albany Street, of the drays, and wagons, and horses, and men, and all things thereunto pertaining; and he was a little bit set up by his importance.

Mrs. Drux was a comely old dame, portly and dignified. She would tell you that she came of the first families of Wessex, and so indeed she did; although her forbears were but bankers and brewers and farmers, and such-like. For the men of Wessex have not faded (or had not then faded) in the shadows of great houses. The land was held not by great territorial lords, but by yeoman and squires. Lords there were, and big houses and great parks; but their big houses were but county villas, in the estimation of the Wessex men. They did not dominate the county, and shut out the sunlight from the plain county-folk. These Wessex people were narrow and exclusive too in their society. Trade did not disqualify; but it must be carried on by a Calum, a Poyser, a Birkin, or a Sponge. Their cliques and coteries, their circles and assemblies, are all dead and withered up; their people have worshipped strange idols, and bowed the knee to Baal.

"Now, my dears," said Mrs. Drux, beaming amiably on the two sweethearts, "I'm an old woman, and can speak my mind, and there's no use in shilly-shallying. I know it was poor dear John's wish that you should be married at once, and I don't see why not. The business wants looking after, and Tom can manage it much better as owner and master than as executor to his poor uncle. Here's the house all ready for you, and wanting a master; and I dare say you won't turn your old aunt out of doors just yet. You know, Tom, dear, that I've got ten thousand pounds of my own, which John invested in the business, and gave me five per cent for; and I paid him two hundred and fifty pounds a year for my keep, and so on; and we can go on in the same way for a while, till you find the old woman a nuisance. So, Tom and Lucy, I say this day month for the wedding-day. No fuss, but just slip out and get married; and then take a week at Boolong or the Isle of Wight, and come home to business again."

Lucy knelt down by her aunt, and hid her face amongst her voluminous skirts. "O aunt," she whispered, "it can't be so soon."

"Dear heart alive, and why not? La! your poor dear papa, that's in heaven now, will be rejoiced at it; but there — I shall leave you and Tom to talk it over."

And so they settled it.

Tom's interview with the banker was protracted. Archie Winter had been right so far, — the bank had made heavy advances to his uncle. But the old banker spoke so quietly and kindly, showed such confidence in Tom's prospects, so flattered his self-love, that Tom found that, almost before he knew it, he had undertaken to take over the business, with its liabilities, on his approaching marriage, — a step which the old banker cordially and warmly approved. He was a kindly old soul, poor Birkin, and honestly desirous to do the best for everybody, consistently with the interests of the "bank."

"And now, my boy, about this little fund of yours, — the five thousand pounds, you'll bring that into the business, of course?" Why, yes, of course, Tom would. "Well, brewing does pay better than consols, eh, Tom? You must sign a power of attorney before you leave, and we'll sell them out for you."

It was n't till Tom had got to his own lodgings, and was smoking a pipe, that the thought struck him, "Where's Mother Drux's ten thousand pounds? Ah! it's in the business somewhere; and my five thousand pounds is going to join it."

He started off to the brewery, to look over the books; but he could n't make head or tail of them. Panks, the bookkeeper, had been keeping the books for the last thirty years on the same principle, and he could n't make head or tail of them. Tom made up his mind to have an alteration here, and walked off to see his lawyer, after signing a few checks from a brand-new check-book, which Tom took a little pride in. It was something to have a banking-account in those days. Now, every man who has cash or credit to the tune of twenty pounds, may have his account, and draw his checks just like a millionaire.

Winter senior was at the office, and glad to see his young client. Tom explained his wants, and his dissatisfaction with the state of the brewery books. "If you'll take my advice, Tom, I would n't make any change at present; keep things going for a time, till you feel qualified to take the management yourself."

"O, as for the books," said Tom, "I'll square them up soon enough. I'm not going to have a lot of idle fellows eating up the business. There's Panks the bookkeeper, and two clerks, and two travellers, and a collector, and a boy, and an old man to take care of the office, and an old woman to take care of the old man. I'll do the whole lot myself, and make a clearance of the crew."

"Gently, Tom, gently; these things must n't be done in a hurry. Leave things alone, and learn the business, Tom."

"Well, that's just what's troubling me," said Tom: "I know nothing of brewing."

"You don't want to, Tom; you don't want to. What's required is management, Tom, management, and keeping the connection together. Your name stands high here, Tom: all the magistrates know you, and knew your father before you. We'll have you on the borough bench, Tom, the next batch that's made."

"Thankee," said Tom; "but still, don't you think if I'm to brew good beer, I ought to know something about the way?"

"Listen, Tom. It is n't by brewing good beer you'll keep up the business. You don't suppose anybody will drink your beer who has the choice of Bass or Allsopp, do you? Management, Tom; management, — that's everything! To buy up all the little public-houses, and advance money to the big ones; to open new houses, and get licenses for your own men, and keep Humby's people out. Then you'll have to sweeten the police; that you'll have to do through your subs; and the worst of that is, that it's wasteful, such a lot of money sticks in the way. Then there's a good deal of trouble in getting hold of public-houses. Why, I know lots of houses your poor uncle has taken on lease for thirty, forty, and sixty pounds a year, and lets again at ten, or fifteen, or twenty pounds."

"I wonder," thought Tom, "if Mrs. Drux's ten thousand pounds is invested in that sort of property?" — "That don't seem a profitable way of investing money, — does it, sir?" he said aloud.

"Profitable, bless me! all that comes out of the beer."

"And out of the pockets of the clodhoppers who drink our beer, sir."

Winter looked up sharply, — he did n't approve of that way of handling topics. "Well, Tom, I'm rather busy just now; but let me advise you at once to call on all the gentry of the county, and solicit their patronage. You won't get anything out of it at first; but they'll like it, and it'll be remembered at licensing-time; and don't go in a stick-up sort of way, but just as a tradesman, and have a big card printed "Mr. Thomas Bellamy, Common Brewer, solicits the favor of the continuance of the gracious patronage accorded to his deceased uncle." There, — something of that sort. And, Tom, put on a black dress-coat; it looks humble and unassuming, and they do like it so. And you must be friendly with the butlers, Tom, and tip them well; they've often saved money, and are looking out for public-houses. They won't drink your beer, Tom; but for harvest homes and tenants' dinners, and that sort of thing, Tom, you may get some good orders from them."

"I'm dashed if I think I shall like the business: there seems to be a great deal of funkiness in this brewing."

"Silly boy, silly boy! you'll never get on without it. Well, good by, Tom. Wedding-day fixed, eh? Wish you joy, — wish you joy."

The wedding-day was fixed, and the wedding came off at the appointed time. Mr. Birkin gave the bride away, and joined the family over the cold fowl and bottle of sherry which did duty for a wedding-breakfast. Whilst the bride was changing her colored dress for a thick travelling one, old Birkin drew Tom into the little breakfast-parlor.

"Tom, I'll get you to write your name across these bills; they represent the amount of our advances to your firm. We shall renew them, of course, from time to time, and we shall only charge you for the stamps and the ordinary current interest."

"Now, suppose," said Tom, "just for the sake of argument, that I won't accept these bills."

"Well, in that case," said Birkin, "we should have to realize our collateral securities."

"And what does that mean?"

"Selling the brew-house, and this house and the furniture, and the public-houses, and disposing of the business to the best advantage; or perhaps we might carry it on ourselves."

"Well, that's candid," said Tom. "Perhaps I'd better sign! It was only my joke, you know, Mr. Birkin."

Mr. Birkin smiled grimly. "Ah, Tom, you must get out of the way of joking in business."

After that Tom's faculties became confused, for Mrs. Tom made her appearance, and they drove off to the station. Happy Tom!

III. NO. 1 MONTGOLFIER TERRACE IN 1857.

Ten years have made many alterations in Barn-cote. It is the close of a November day, — the sun is going down into the sea in a gold and purple haze. The esplanade is crowded; fair girls are dashing past on horseback; carriages are rolling by; and yet with all there is a hush and a calm, that may be felt. You hear the ringing laughter of light-hearted girls, the beat of the horses' hoofs, the jingling of the harness, and the rattle of the wheels; but between all you can catch the measured splash of the waves, the thud of the oars in the rowlocks of the boat in which the fisherman stands throwing out his nets, and the hail of his comrade on shore.

Ten years have prospered well with Barn-cote. In '47, only a provincial bathing-town; in '57, a "queen amongst watering-places."

Montgolfier Terrace has shared in the general advance. No. 3, where Mr. Hanks lived, is now occupied by the Countess Bigaroon, family, and suite. Admiral Bobbin, the sea-lord, lives in No. 4. By and by, when the daylight is altogether gone, and the tattoo is sounded at the barracks, and the picket is tramping along, turning our gallant defenders out of the public-houses, where they have been stupefying themselves with Bellamy & Co.'s Entire, if you stroll up Montgolfier Terrace, you will see through the windows on the ground-floor, wide open, although in November, men and women in evening dress, and dinner-tables loaded with crystal and flowers and sparkling lights; and you shall hear the band in the enclosure playing selections from Fra Diavolo, and through the din the susurrus of the surges, and the creaking of the capstan, and the "Heave oh!" of the fishers, hauling up the Mary Jane out of the reach of the advancing spring-tide.

No. 1, however, has not shared in the general advance. No. 1 still dines at one, and has tea at seven, and sups at nine, for No. 1 does not affect the mode, but is only the residence of Alderman and ex-Mayor Bellamy, a mere local magnate.

On this night in November, the worthy alderman is enjoying his tea in his drawing-room, and we will look in upon him, and see how the past ten years have affected him and his fair partner.

Lucy Bellamy is as beautiful as ever, a charming model of an English matron. Still of the placid forehead, the limpid eyes, and flowing lines of fig. ure, which mature age has only developed and rounded to perfection.

Happy Tom! A little girl of eight is climbing about his knees, and claiming a share of the teacake he is consuming. But Tom has n't worn so well. There are wrinkles enough about his forehead, and round his eyes; when his mouth is at rest, it is a little drawn down at the corners. Seen now as he leans back and shuts his eyes, it is a sad and weary face; but it brightens up into life and love as his wife leans over his chair, and pushes the hair off his forehead in the old caressing way.

"You look so worn out, Tom, dear; it must have been a very trying day for you, poor fellow! Mr. Birkin was such a kind friend, was n't he, Tom?"

Tom grunted some unintelligible answer, which his wife took for assent, and went on, "You must n't grieve, Tom, dear. He lived his appointed time, and he's now reaping the reward of his long life of good deeds."

You see Mrs. Tom was rather given to preaching; but then she was so good and devout herself, that her only grief almost was that her dear, good Tom did n't seem to think so much of spiritual things as he ought.

"Yes," said Tom; "he lived his appointed time; but for all that, I wish he'd lived a little longer."

"Ah, Tom, we must n't repine," said the sweet homilist. "Did n't Arthur Birkin feel it very much?"

"By Jove!" said Tom, "I wish I'd felt it the same way. The old boy left every penny to Arthur."

"O, I'm so glad, Tom! I was afraid he did n't like Arthur, and that he'd leave his money away to the Burgesses: he was so fond of the Burgesses."

"Tell you what, Lu; what old Birkin was fond of was the bank: he worshipped the bank. Do you think he'd leave his money to be squandered by those dashing Burgesses? No. He saw what a hard skinflint Arthur was, and he did n't like him, for the old man was n't a bad sort himself; but for all that, he knew that Arthur would keep up the bank; and that's the secret of it."

"Do you know, Tom, I thought perhaps he'd leave you something?"

"Well, he did n't; that's all," said Tom, roughly; and Lucy retreated to her own seat, rather offended. Tom shut his eyes again, and leaned wearily back in his chair. Mrs. Tom softened again as she watched his pale face.

"Tom, dear, I'm afraid you're worrying."

"Well, I've had a good deal to try me lately."

"In business you mean, Tom?"

"Well, yes."

"But Tom, dear, you should n't let your mind dwell so much upon business. Think, dear, that you should lean upon a Higher Power, who orders everything as He wills."

"Ah!" said Tom with a sigh that came from the bottom of his heart.

For the last ten years, Tom's religion had been this, — to clear the firm with Birkin's bank. For this he had risen early, and late taken rest, and eaten the bread of carefulness. This accomplished he would live his life in peace and thankfulness. The load he had heaped upon his own back had been very heavy upon him. At first, the consciousness that he had done his duty bore him up on his up-hill way. That he had fulfilled his uncle's dying wish; that he had kept his memory from reproach; that he had saved Lucy and her aunt from destitution, and borne up the credit of the old firm: these were thoughts that sustained and comforted him. And then he knew full well that this was the price he had paid for his wife, for Lucy would never have married the man who had refused to carry out his solemn promise, made on his uncle's death-bed. But as years rolled on, and Tom's mind cleared itself from the mists of boyish enthusiasm, he took a very different view of the matter.

Tom's troubles came upon him with redoubled force this night. He had struggled so hard the last ten years; and he had so nearly succeeded, — so nearly succeeded! But Birkin's death would probably ruin him; he would go down within reach of land. He had left home that morning with a hopeful heart.

The old man had been so kind to him in his lifetime; not a wicked old man of the sea, choking the life out of his slave, but a kind, considerate old man, driving him quietly, and letting him take breath ever and again. Surely he would leave him something; he might even leave him the amount of his indebtedness, for the bank had, after all, been paid nearly all the original debt, and the estate could so well afford it; for Birkin & Co. were shak' no longer. The waste of building-land, and the shells of tenantless houses, on which the firm had made such large advances, which, on the failure of the land-jobbers, and the building-jobbers, and the working-builders, the bank had been obliged to take possession of, and which had caused such a lock-up of capital: this piece of marsh by the seaside was now covered by aristocratic mansions, gorgeous squares, and noble terraces, and had proved a perfect Pactolus, streaming gold into the coffers of the bank. "Oh!" thought Tom, "if I can come back to my wife a free man to-night, there won't be a happier dog in England than I!" But it was n't to be. As Tom sat by the fire that night, he felt tightening round his neck the wretched burden of his life.

As Tom sat by the fire, he looked at his wife, busy with some feminine work, one shapely hand holding the thread, whilst the other drove a tiny shuttle to and fro. Gracie sat coiled on the floor, leaning against her mother's knee, absorbed in a story-book, her lips just parted, and one little hand playing with a straggling curl. And then the thought came into his mind, — it had been there often before, but unacknowledged, driven away, before it took shape; but now he took it up, and handled and examined it, — the thought was a question: "Was she worth it?"

"Yes; by Heaven!" was Tom's exclamation. It broke out unawares; it frightened his wife out of her wits, and made Gracie jump on to her feet.

"Papa!" said Lucy; and there was a world of mild reproach in her voice.

"Mamma," said Gracie, a little casuist, deeply read in all the lore of catechism and commandment, "was n't that taking the name of God's holy dwelling in vain?"

"No, not in vain, my darling," said Tom, drawing her to him, and giving her a long lingering kiss, — "not in vain."

Next morning at breakfast Mr. Bellamy told his wife that he had made up his mind to insure his life.

"But why, Tom?"

"I think it only prudent, my dear; so much of the business depends on my own work, that I ought to take care of your future, in case anything should happen to me."

Mrs. Tom put down the coffee-pot, and looked at her husband with suffused eyes. That anything should happen to Tom! "But, Tom, dear, you don't feel ill, or anything?"

"The insurance doctors will take care of that, Lucy: they won't insure my life if there's any prospect of my premature death."

"But, Tom, is n't there Aunt Drux's ten thousand pounds? Poor aunt! she told me just before she died what a comfort it was to her that we were so well provided for; and I was so pleased, Tom, that she left it to you, instead of settling it, or anything, — it showed such confidence in you, dear Tom."

"Delightful!" said Tom, who did n't know exactly what he was saying.

"Well, then, Tom, if anything should happen, we should have enough to live upon; and just what would keep Gracie and me would be all we should want without you, Tom."

"Ah, the ten thousand your aunt left is in the business. But I shall never make you understand, Lucy. I can only say that I think it necessary to insure my life."

Tom went to Mr. Winter's office, — Winter senior was dead, and Archibald ruled in his stead. He was agent for the "Legal Luminary," the "Dubious" and "Disputable," and one or two other life offices.

"Want to insure your life, Tom? Of course; what every prudent man ought to do. I told you long ago you should do it. What amount do you intend to propose for?"

"Ten thousand pounds."

The last ten years have not made much change in Archie Winter. Except that he has had his hair cut, — that instead of displaying a whole bosom-full of shirt-front, he is buttoned tightly up to his chin, in an Oxford Mixture suit, you would n't notice any alteration in him.

He cast a quick look at Tom from under his bushy eyebrows.

"Biggish sum, is n't it?"

"Not more than it ought to be," said Tom. "Nobody but myself could work the business so economically. Were I to die, it would be necessary to have a manager at five hundred pounds a year or so, besides a clerk or two; I don't want my wife to suffer pecuniarily by my death."

"Still, after all, Tom, there would be a good income left for your widow."

"Archie, I don't mind telling you what I dare say you know; I've got borrowed capital in the business. Now, if I were to die, that would probably be called in. Well, this insurance would replace it."

"Just so," said Winter; "I quite see your motives. Well, I shall be very glad to take your proposals. Suppose we say three thousand pounds in the Legal, three thousand in the Dubious, and two thousand each in the Highland Husbands and Scotch Veritable? Well, it's easily arranged. You'll fill up these forms: they're much about the same; some of 'em want to know if your grandmother wore false teeth, and some of 'em only ask if your father was troubled with corns." Mr. Winter here enjoyed a hearty laugh at his own joke. I fancy Artemus Ward borrowed this joke, but he did n't acknowledge it.

Tom had to go up to London, the assurance being a heavy one, and was poked about by the united doctors of the four companies, and questioned most minutely as to all his habits. He had frequent interviews with four boards of directors and four secretaries. The result was satisfactory. The united doctors could find no fault with Tom's constitution or physique. The united boards could find no flaw in Tom's reasons for insuring so heavily. There was no agent for whom the societies had a higher regard than Mr. Archibald Winter. He was perfectly satisfied. The directors were perfectly satisfied. The proposals were accepted; and Tom had to draw a check for three hundred and sixty-seven pounds, the amount of the united premiums.

IV. THE BARNCOTE BANK IN 1857.

The announcement of the Barncote public ball for New Year's Eve had appeared for several weeks in the Barncote Herald, with a long list of stewards and lady patronesses, low down on which, as be-seemed their mere local position stood the names of Alderman Tom and Mrs. Bellamy. Tom's thoughts were not, however, on balls, as he stood at the tall desk in the brewery counting-house which looked out into the brewery yard. He held in his hand a sheet of figures. It was Tom's profit and loss account for the year just ending, and it was n't an unsatisfactory one. It showed in round numbers a profit of two thousand five hundred pounds; and Tom's drawing had only been one thousand two hundred pounds. Tom called his manager into the counting-house, and showed him the balance-sheet. "Very satisfactory indeed, sir," said Birks, who from much poring over vats and inhalation of warty vapors, was rather husky in the throat.

"I'm greatly indebted to you, Birks, for the way you've worked for me. I've signed a check for your salary and the wages. I've great pleasure in giving you this check for fifty pounds as a new year's present. I sha'n't be here to-morrow, Birks, as I'm going to Luffhaven to collect, and can't be back till late at night. So I'll wish you a happy new year, Birks; and good by, and God bless you!"

Birks was embarrassed by the warmth of his master's manner and the largeness of his gift. A five-pound note was about the figure he usually had. Fifty pounds! Birks's salary was ten pounds a month, and when it came it was usually fore-stalled; and there were also numerous little scores against him, which were troubling his mind this festive Christmas-tide. Indeed, Mr. Parkins, the draper, had been very sharp with him about a small account which he owed for mourning, for a little boy who had died two years ago; and Parkins had threatened to complain to his master of his dishonesty in not paying his bills. Poor Birks had fancied that he had seen Parkins walking up with Mr. Tom, and he imagined the summons to the counting-house was a prelude to instant dismissal.

Fifty pounds was to Birks salvation; it would pay off his old scores, it would start him afresh, it would make a man of him. But he could n't thank his master for it, — the words stuck in his throat; they could n't struggle through the deposits of the vats. His master smiled and nodded, and passed out. Birks followed him to the door, and watched him down the street.

"He's just the kindest, thoughtfulest soul is the young master; but, dear me, how he be aged the last few years surely!"

Tom's face was not that of a youngster as he entered the private parlor of Birkin's bank. Arthur Birkin rose and shook him coldly by the hand, and then took his stand with his back to the fire. He was a short, dark, neat little man, excessively clean-looking, dressed quietly and plainly, as became a banker, but with a little touch of the country squire breaking out in his blue bird's-eye scarf, his roomy shooting-coat, and well-shaped riding-trousers.

After a little chat about the weather, the last run with the East Wessex hounds, and the town drains, Arthur, without circumlocution, went to the purport of their interview.

"I sent for you, Bellamy, to tell you we must have our advances repaid. I gave you a hint of the sort a few days ago, and I find that it is now absolutely necessary."

I don't suppose that the bird fairly caught and fluttering in the paws of the cat, its captor, suffers much terror and agony of mind: the thing is over: a sort of fatuous wonder as to how it will feel whilst its bones are being crunched, and a stupid amazement at being in such a plight are in its mind; it reckons not of its modest mate, the peaceful nest, the callow brood. So with Tom: he had discounted his troubles; he felt stupefied, that was all. The long, long while he had suffered, the trouble he had had, seemed to surge into his head, and prevented him from thinking. Only one thing could he hold on to, that he must show no change to that black-whiskered face with the dark-gray eyes, and wide mouth, and white teeth; he must hold on to that face, and not let himself go. He sat down on the banker's table, and taking up some pens, began sticking them javelin fashion into the leather cover. It was an old trick of his boyhood.

Arthur exclaimed angrily, "Mr. Bellamy, please not to damage my table."

That woke Tom up; the whirl in his head stopped; he stood up, and confronted the banker. "How can you expect me to reduce my debt more rapidly than I am now doing? Have n't I paid off twenty thousand in the last ten years? Have n't I worked like a nigger for you? Why, Birkin, when your uncle persuaded me to take over the concern in '47, you stood to lose thirty thousand pounds; and I put five thousand pounds of my own in it; and I believe I saved the bank by that. And your uncle was my trustee! Arthur, how can you be so wicked, knowing all you do, to talk to me of calling up that money?"

"My uncle was a very good sort of man, and was very forbearing with your uncle and yourself. I don't know anything more about the transactions you refer to. My uncle was not very sound upon banking, however. It's our principle, Mr. Bellamy, not to make advances except upon convertible securities."

"Have n't you got the deeds of the brewery and all the freehold houses?"

"Just so; and taking the brewery as a going concern, its value would no doubt cover our advances. But look here; in time of pressure, when we wanted to realize, such security would be practically worthless. A prudent mariner, dreading an approaching storm, takes in his canvas, and — and — Well, you know he gets ready for it. We foresee a crisis in the money-market, and we are preparing for it. We don't want to inconvenience you; but really now the advance has been standing so long — Mr. Andrews," whispered the banker through a speaking-tube, "bring down Bellamy's note."

"You damned serpent!" hissed Tom between his teeth. "No; don't run away; I'm not going to hurt you, you little venomous beast!" And he stalked out of the private room before Arthur Birkin had recovered from his astonishment.

Tom was not altogether mad; he knew that the promissory-note which Birkin held was payable fourteen days after demand, — that he had a good balance on his current account, — and that Arthur Birkin would not be moved from his purpose were Tom, and his wife and his daughter, to grovel in the dust before him.

Arthur Birkin was a "gentleman." He was a little upset at being called a serpent and sworn at; but if there was one thing he prided himself upon, it was that he had a Christian and forgiving spirit. Nor was the accusation Tom hurled against him a just one. He only wanted his own. He was too clear-headed and sensible a man to be influenced in his line of conduct by the supposed wishes of a man who was dead. Certainly, he had often heard old Birkin promise Tom that he should never be unduly pressed about the advance so long as he kept reducing the principal. But what was that to him? The old banker had made many indiscreet and foolish advances out of the goodness of his heart. Arthur had no idea of setting up as a little providence, and rewarding virtue, and all that; and that his keen intelligence should be dominated by some old-fashioned notions which formerly animated a departed soul, was to him a thing inconceivable. Still, he was quite disposed to act fairly by Tom Bellamy; and if he'd asked him for a month, or even for two, and could have satisfied him that the money would be forthcoming, Tom might have had the time, — yes, and might now, notwithstanding the serpent and the venom.

Tom went off to the joint-stock bank. Yes, they'd take his account with much pleasure, — discount for him with pleasure. As for a large advance, for a considerable period — yes, with pleasure! — on sufficient security. Life policies? — No; the bank would rather not take that sort of security — was against the rules of banking. "But bring your interests to us," said the manager cheerily; "we'll take care you don't suffer."

Very satisfactory this, as far as it went. Tom knew, however, it would n't go very far. He must try and think of something. He'd go on to the pier, where he would be quiet. He turned through the pay-wicket, and went on to the pier. He had n't been there for years. People who live near the sea rarely go down to the beach, or on to the pier, or out in a boat, or in any way take notice of the sea. The fashionable visitors of Barncombe did n't care about the pier. It was out of their beat; and a few children and nursemaids were generally the only visitors to the pier-head. The day was cold and raw, with an east wind, and nobody but Tom was about. He went out to the end, and sat down on a beam a little sheltered from the wind. From habit he took his pipe out of its case, and knocked it against the beam; but he did n't smoke. He could n't think, either, connectedly of his business. He knew, he felt, it was useless. The blow that had fallen upon him was fatal. He pitied himself a little. He had worked so hard; he had been so near success; but he had failed; and his failure was final and irremediable. He felt expressibly sad. A wasted life! — Was n't all life wasted? a causeless and purposeless ebbing and flowing? Would n't it be better to end it all, by dropping quietly into the swirling waters? And then he thought of his wife at her needlework at home, and of Gracie sitting by her knee, — radiant figures in all the gloom. He could think and plot for them, though not for himself. He rose and left the pier. The shadow of overwhelming care had cleared away. A shadow there still was upon him, a shadow and a light.

"Gracious, Tom," said Lucy as she kissed him on his return, "how cold you are! you must stop at home to-night, and have your feet in hot water: you've got a chill."

"Nonsense, child; it's nothing," said Tom. "Stay at home! why, it's the ball to-night; I would n't miss the New-Year's ball on any account. Don't you remember ten years ago?"

V. THE BARNCOTE BALL IN 1857.

The old Barncote assembly-rooms had been pulled down years ago. In their place was a town-hall, with a Grecian portico. Within, was a fine room, supported by polished granite columns; a large organ and an orchestra at one end; as well as numerous refreshment-rooms, committee-rooms, and law-courts, — the last only used by the local justices in petty sessions, and the county court judge. But the Barncotians were living in hopes that, some day or other, the judges of assize would enter those courts with much blaring of trumpets, and rushing to and fro of policemen. Her Majesty's judges, however, and those minor judges who held her Majesty's commission of the peace, and ruled the destinies of the county in quarter-sessions assembled, were understood to set their faces against any alteration; so the assizes were still held in the little town of Lumpstone, some fifteen miles from Barncote. As three fifths of the prisoners, and four fifths of the civil cases, came from Barncote, there might seem to be some reason why the judges should come to the suitors, rather than the suitors should go to the judges. But legal wisdom had decided otherwise.

The damage also to the hotels of Lumpstone, which contrived to exist and pay their rents from the exorbitant profits they extorted from the visitors to the assizes, would have been great; and as these hotels were owned by county magnates, who served their Queen and county as magistrates, deputy-lieutenants, and high-sheriffs, law and order would have been indirectly damaged by their loss.

Tum te iddity, tum te iddity! away went the fiddles, cornet, and harp at the opening quadrille. The hall was three times as big as the old assembly-room, and infinitely more grand: the girls were better dressed, and the men were better got up; but it was n't half so jolly as in the old times, — at least, so Tom thought, as he opened the ball with the Mayoress of Barncote, whilst the worthy mayor led out Mrs. Alderman Tom. The hall felt cold and chill, in spite of the brilliant sunlights and the hot-water pipes; and Tom looked over his shoulder every now and then, and shuddered. He certainly had got a chill. He almost made up his mind to go home and take his wife's advice about the hot water. The thought of his comfortable dressing-room, and the cheery fire, and the steaming tub, and the glass of hot grog that his wife would administer to him, came so strongly into his mind, that the tears came into his foolish eyes, and he forgot to "chassez" to his partner, who, spreading out her plum-colored skirts, was going through her paces unaided, with much dissatisfaction.

No such visions could be realized that night. Tom must be at Luffhaven by five in the morning, to meet the steward of the Luffhaven mail-boat, who owed Tom a long account, which he had promised to settle; and after that, he had a heavy day's collecting from Luffhaven to Lumpstone. He expected to get in about five hundred pounds.

He was claimed after the quadrille by his old friend Winter, who wanted him to go and have a rubber in the mayor's little parlor, which had been reserved for the cognoscenti; and Tom went and played, but was absent and distrait; trumped his partner's trick, led a false card, and otherwise misconducted himself. The whist languished, and the table was broken up; and Tom and Archibald found themselves sitting together by the fire as they had been ten years before.

"Tom," said Winter, "are n't you glad you did n't take my advice ten years ago?"

"I don't know," said Tom dreamily.

"Ah! you were right, Tom, and I was wrong. I was a shocking young prig ten years ago, I think. Don't you remember how I solemnly assured you that you were on your way to 'misery, ruin, death'?"

"So you did," said Tom with a start.

"Bad shot, was n't it? Why, I think you are the luckiest fellow in the whole county of Wessex at this present moment."

"Archie," quoth Tom, after a pause, "which do you think is the worst of the three?"

"O Mr. Bellamy," said one of the waiters, putting his head into the room, "I'm glad I've found you, sir; there's a young man from your office wishes to speak with you."

"Send him in here, Williams."

Enter Birks. He is dressed in decent black, which looks rusty and dull beside the sleek clothes of his master and friend. His red, bulbous nose shows all the more that his cheeks are pale and tallowy. He is evidently suffering from strong fear.

"What is it, Birks?"

"O dear Mr. Bellamy, you ain't going to drive all alone to Luffhaven to-night, be you, sir?"

"Yes, of course," said Bellamy sharply.

"But, dear heart alive! there's been two farmers stopped on the Lumpstone Road this very night. Three men with black maskesses on, and pistols."

"Where did you get hold of that cock-and-bull story?"

"It's all the talk at the White Hart bar, sir."

"Ah! I thought you'd been there. Well, don't come after me again, Birks, with these foolish stories."

"But, master, if you must go, take me with you; I'm sure you'll be murdered if you don't: everybody knows as you carry bags full of money with you."

Tom laughed. "Much good you'd be in a scrimmage, Birks. If your friends in the black masks know so much about me, they'll also know that I carry a brace of double-barrelled pistols in my gig, and can use them too. Go home to bed, Birks."

Birks shook his head in a melancholy way; but he could n't say any more, and slunk out.

"I would be careful, Tom, though, if I were you," said Winter. "Let's go and get supper."

Tom had a fancy to dance one dance with his wife that night. It was the Lancers. Ten years ago the Lancers had decided Tom's fate. As he stood up once more to the well-known figure, and the band struck up the prelude, all the events of the last ten years crowded into Tom's mind. Such happy, peaceful years, but for the load he had been staggering under so long, and which was going to crush him at last!

Tum te iddity, tum te iddity! A playful poke in the back from his neighbor reminded him that he was stopping the way in the grand chain: away he hopped, getting many a pleasant squeeze of the hand and merry greeting. They were all townspeople in the set, and everybody liked Tom, especially the women-folk.

The music ceased, the figure ended, and still Tom stood for a moment with his wife in his arms, as they had finished the final galop. "Good by, darling," he whispered; "enjoy yourself, dear: don't sit up for me to-morrow night."

He was gone, and his wife looked after him wistfully for a moment.

Tom had ordered his dog-cart to take him up at his house. He walked home along the esplanade. Ten years ago, the moon was reflected gloriously in rippling waters: to-night, the sky was dark and overcast; the wind was rising; and while breakers were dashing eagerly in, Tom thought of the man who had gone down to the sea to ask a boon for his wife.

He opened the door of his house gently, and walked up-stairs on tiptoe into the room where Gracie was sleeping peacefully in her little cot.

There we will leave him, till the clatter of hoofs reminds him of the dog-cart and mare awaiting him.

The mare is fidgety, and will not stand; Tom was in his seat in a moment; and wrapping his rug round his knees as the mare darted forward with a plunge, and settling into a slinging trot, dashed into the gloomy night and gathering storm.

VI. RELEASE IN FULL.

The morning was breaking coldly and cloudily on the day but one following the Barncote ball. No. 1 Montgolfier Terrace was still without its lord. By the fire in her husband's dressing-room sat Lucy Bellamy, wrapped in a warm wrapper, sleeping quietly.

Rap-tap-a-tap-tap-dab-dab! Lucy woke in a moment, looking round bewildered for an instant, and then remembering her long vigil: "Here's dear Tom at last," she said, giving a vigorous stir to the fire, and running down stairs to open the door. At the door stood Archibald Winter, grim and grimed, unkempt, unshaven: never before or since did Archibald Winter meet female eyes in such a plight.

Murdered—murdered—murdered! What use to break such news as this? The whole universe seemed to shout it in her ears, and yet he whispered it very gently. It was for her to weep and moan, for him to raise the county on the foul villains.

Ere an hour is past, in every homestead in Wessex, sturdy sons of Anak, unshorn and unwashed, are rousing up their hinds to beat the county for the murderers. One of their own flesh and blood!

The stream of Saxon blood still runs strongly in the veins of the Wessex men. Had the Lord-Lieutenant been murdered, it would n't have sent such a shock through the country-side, or roused so many eager hearts to the chase of blood, as did the death of Tom Bellamy, the brewer. Mounted police were galloping furiously along the county roads, to draw a cordon round the scene of the deed; the county magistrates had already met in special session at the White Hind at Lumpstone; and the body of Tom Bellamy was lying at the Eight Bells at Snarfield, awaiting the coroner's inquest. It was just half-way between Lumpstone and Snarfield that poor Tom had been shot. The road, which winds in and out amongst the bluff downs, here reaches its highest point: thick and tall hedges hem it in on each side; the road takes a sudden turn; and just in the corner, among the grass and dead leaves, the mail-cart driver carrying the early mail from Lumpstone to Barncote saw the body lying. He gave the alarm at Snarfield, and carried the news on to Barncote. Tom's horse was found quietly grazing by the roadside, a little nearer Snarfield; the dog-cart was lying upset between. The mare had apparently kicked herself free from the cart; the traces were broken, and the breeching-straps; but otherwise there was not much damage done.

When Winter reached the Eight Bells, he met Mr. Baker, the Snarfield surgeon, coming away. "Dead for three or four hours, I should say. Shot through the heart. The villain who did it must have put the pistol to his breast, for the powder has burnt his waistcoat. I've been telling the people here to send somebody to search for the bullet; it might give a clew: it went right through him. Poor Tom; he was a decent fellow."

"The superintendent has attended to that, I think, sir; he has posted men on each side of the place, and they've been examining the ground inch by inch for the last two hours," said the landlord of the Eight Bells.

The police, however, could n't make much of the trail: the ground was trampled about: Tom's pocket-book had been ransacked, and was lying open on the grass; his watch and chain and purse were gone. The murderers had made a good booty, and got clear off. Ere the evening, the whole country-side confessed that they were baffled. There was one comforting circumstance,—the robbers had not made such a haul as they must have expected: Tom had paid five hundred pounds into the Lumpstone bank before he left.

Next morning, whilst the secretary of the Legal was unlocking his private drawer, and getting out his papers, Mr. Jakes, the actuary, looked in at the office door: "Seen the murder in Wessex, in this morning's paper?"

"Yes; what of it?"

"Why, it's one of our lives."

"God bless my soul! is it?"

"Yes; and a devilish heavy life too! and the first year! Bellamy his name is."

The secretary took down his index, and turned to the Bs. "Bellamy, Bellamy. Ah! here he is. Three thousand, by Jove! And the Dubious, and the Highlands, and the Veritable, are in with us." The secretary touched a spring-bell on the table: "O Mr. Bowler, just write out a telegram for me: 'Secretary Legal Life to A. Winter, Esq., Barncote.—Bellamy's death, send full particulars: meet the Board to-day if possible.'"

The secretary prided himself on his telegrams;

he always managed to express his meaning in twenty words, thus saving miscellaneous charges to the society. Before he left the office, he received a telegram from Barncote: "A. Winter, Barncote, to Secretary Legal Life, Lothbury. — Am solicitor to deceased's executors. Send special agent, if you think inquiries necessary. Will send particulars of claim to-morrow."

The secretary shook his head. "Mr. Winter has not prepaid the telegram! Dear, dear! it might all have been said in less than twenty words. Two shillings, — dear, dear! I don't know what the Board will say. I think, by the way, Mr. Bowler, I shall suggest to the Board that in such an important case I'd better go down to Barncote myself. A little sea-air will do me good, Bowler."

Mr. Cranby, the secretary of the Legal Life, when he arrived at Barncote next morning, was informed by Mr. Winter that the inquest on Tom Bellamy had been held; that a verdict of "Wilful murder against some person or persons unknown" had been returned by the coroner's jury; that two men had been apprehended on suspicion; and that the magistrates and police were busily engaged in investigating the circumstances of the dreadful deed. Mr. Winter proposed to drive Mr. Cranby over to Snarfield, to see the body and the scene of the murder. It was a bleak January day, and Mr. Cranby did not think it at all necessary.

"We don't want further proof of the death, Mr. Winter; we are quite satisfied about that. The only question that struck our Board was this: do the circumstances of the death altogether preclude the idea of — eh? — um? — ah?"

"What do you mean," said Winter, sharply.

"Well, you know, it occurred to our Board that, — well, in point of fact, — suicide!"

"You have not broached such an idea to anybody in Barncote, I hope, Mr. Cranby?"

"Dear me, no!"

"Ah! that's right. Do you know, I think that if it were known you were down here for an insurance company, trying to save your company's pockets by casting a slur on poor Tom Bellamy's memory, — on my soul, I think you'd be torn to pieces before you could get to the station."

"God bless my soul! Surely, Mr. Winter, such lawlessness in the nineteenth century is not possible?"

"Ah! you don't know what our Barncote boys can do. But, apart from that, my dear Cranby, don't let such a very foolish suggestion escape you again. No man was more happy in all his social relations than Tom Bellamy, no man more respected in public life. A magistrate, an alderman, an ex-mayor, a man of blameless life and character — and you suggest suicide! Now, Mr. Cranby, as solicitor to the estate of my dear deceased friend, I have been put into possession of the papers found on his body. You're quite at liberty to look over them, and amongst others you'll find our friend's profit and loss account for the year just ended. He was a remarkably energetic and careful man; it's made up to the last day of the year. You see the profit shown; you see my friend's expenses. Why, he was at our ball the evening before he was murdered, danced with my wife, who never saw him more cheerful. Why, Cranby, he was the best friend I ever had, and you come to me whispering such vile suggestions — good God!" and Winter leaned his head on his arm, quite overcome.

Cranby sat up, and patted him on the shoulder.

"There, there! — don't agitate yourself; I'll never mention it again. We had the mere vaguest doubt on the matter, and I assure you we're entirely satisfied now."

"Then, look here, Cranby; you've a Board day to-morrow, — waive all forms, and send me down a check for three thousand by to-morrow's post. I'll take care that it shall be known all over Wessex, — ay, and all over England, for that matter. You could not do a better thing for the society's interest. I'll guarantee to double our business in this agency alone."

"Well, but, Winter, you have not administered yet, or anything."

"Never mind that; I'll give you a receipt that will satisfy you. Bless you, we don't want the money; it's the society I'm thinking of. You see the funeral's on Friday — all the county will be there. Well, if I have that check in my pocket, and show it to a few friends after the funeral, there is not a man in Wessex who won't know of it before night; and if I don't have a hundred proposals in a week, call me a Dutchman."

"I think you're right, Mr. Winter; I'll advise the Board to do it."

"That's right. Now, let me take you to see Mrs. Winter. You'll dine and have a bed at Rhino Square, and go back in the morning to the Board meeting."

Mr. Winter was right when he foretold that all Wessex would be at Tom Bellamy's funeral. When the hearse containing Tom's body left the Eight Bells at Snarfield for the churchyard of Snitterfield, which was Tom's parish, there followed some twenty private carriages of the county and town gentry, forty or fifty dog-carts and wagonettes belonging to the farmers of the county, several hundred horsemen, and hundreds of footmen. Never had such a funeral been seen in Wessex. It took ten minutes before the last man in the procession filed past the Eight Bells at Snarfield. There was plenty of beer for all the mourners at the Wagon and Horses at Snitterfield, and there was a substantial luncheon for the farmers laid out in a large barn near the churchyard. Birks had managed all the arrangements, and had been ordered to spare no expense. Barrels of ale and large stone jars of spirits had been sent up from Barncote; and the melancholy rite performed, the farmers laid themselves out for enjoyment.

Mr. Winter made his appearance amongst them for a moment; and the clatter of knives and plates, and the calls for beer and grog, were hushed. "My friends," he said, "the relatives of the departed desire me to thank you most gratefully for the mark of respect you have shown his memory. Called suddenly away, our poor friend was not unprepared. I will leave your spiritual guides to draw a moral from his sudden death. I will only recommend you to follow his example, and prepare for it in a worldly point of view. I have in my hand a check for three thousand pounds, which has been sent to me, acting for the representatives of the deceased, in payment of a policy of life insurance which by my advice he effected with the Legal Office. One premium of ninety pounds only has produced this most considerable sum. Go and do likewise."

From that day the Legal Life dates a period of largely increasing business; and I don't think it suffered any loss in the end from poor Tom's death.

Mr. Winter's next business was with Birkin's bank; and the day after the funeral saw Arthur Birkin and Winter closeted together in the bank parlor.

"We won't acknowledge your claim at all, Mr. Birkin; and we raise a claim for five thousand pounds and ten years' interest against you, as executor of your deceased uncle. A more heartless and flagrant breach of trust than that of your uncle, when he persuaded that poor young man to hand over his fortune to pay old Callum's debts to the bank, I never met with in the whole course of my legal experience."

"I really can't go into the question of my uncle's motives or actions, Mr. Winter," said Arthur, calmly and loftily.

"But I'll compel you to go into them, sir!" cried Winter, bristling up. "I'll file a bill against you, sir!—a bill in Chancery, sir! You shall account for every penny you've received from my poor ill-fated friend. There's such a thing as a Court of Equity, sir, thank God!"

"Well, Mr. Winter, if you can show me any legal obligation on my part"—

"I think one of the vice-chancellors had better enlighten you on the point."

Arthur Birkin meditated. One of the principles of a bank should be to avoid litigation. He might lose more by a suit than he could estimate. To shake the good name of his late uncle would shake the credit of the bank. "How can we settle the matter, Mr. Winter?"

"Withdraw your claim, and we'll withdraw ours."

"Really, now, that's very unreasonable."

"That's my ultimatum."

"You'll give me a few days to consider?"

"I'll instruct my agents to-night to file a bill."

Arthur Birkin thought it over for a few moments. Ten thousands pounds was very dear to him, but the good name of the bank was dearer still.

"Your terms are very hard, but I'll accept them."

"I think you're wise."

When Mr. Winter found himself in the sanctuary of his own office, he permitted a grin of intense self-satisfaction to irradiate his features.

"Just to think, now, what a little clearness of vision does for a man! Bellamy, poor fellow, went through life borne down by a load which a touch would have loosened. And he was a clear-headed, good man of business too; but he saw things through a mist of fancied generosity, trust, family pride, and what not. Dear, good old giant! you were everything that was honest, true, and faithful; if you could only have seen things as they are! You were an anachronism, that's all."

After the first shock, Mrs. Tom Bellamy took comfort. There are some women with faith so vivid and clear that they actually carry about with them the unseen world, which to others seems only the shadow of a dream. That she and Tom are only parted for a brief moment, is to her a certainty, and not a form of expression. She has not married again, although she is a rich woman, and has many suitors.

Some of the prosperity of the Barncoate brewery is due to the untiring energy of Mr. Birks. He is now installed as manager with a handsome salary. He only "breaks out" now on New-Year's day; and as he then takes a week's holiday to have his "spree" out, it doesn't interfere with business.

Two years after Tom's death, Birks was finishing up a hard drinking-bout at the Eight Bells at Snarfield. He had come to the brandy and soda-water and penitence stage, and was sitting alone in the bar-parlor, trying to smoke. An old man in the costume of a hedger and ditcher put his head cautiously into the room, and finding Birks alone, came in and closed the door.

"I've been leuking along of you, sir," said the old man.

"Well, what do you want?"

"Why, you see I've been clearing out the big pond close longside the road about an mile from Lumpstone; and as I was a-shovelling out the mud, I clap eyes on something as I thought were a bit of old rag; and I teuk it up jest to throw it away, and it was jest heavy; and look here!"

The old man brought out of his pocket a bundle of wet rag, and laid it on the table. Birks untied it with fingers trembling with the effect of his late potations. "Why, it's my old master's handkerchief!" said Birks, as pale as death; "and here's his watch and purse."

"So it be," said the old man.

"Those murdering villains were so hard pressed they had to throw 'em away."

"Surely!" said Giles.

"I'm sorry for you, though," said Birks after a pause.

"Why, what hev I done, sir?"

"You don't think the police will believe your tale of your having found these things in a pond?"

"Dear, dear; I hope I sha'n't get into no trouble!"

"That you certainly will, if these things are found upon you; you'll be took up for the murder, as sure as a gun."

"O lawks-a-massy! what shall I do, master?"

"You haven't told anybody else about finding these things?"

"Dear no, sir, not a soul!"

"Well, I won't say a word to bring you into trouble. Just you go back as hard as ever you can, and put them things back into the pond again."

Old Giles hobbled off in mortal fear of being "took up"; and in about an hour's time reappeared beaming. "I've done that to rights now, master."

"That's right, Giles. Now go and get a pint of beer. I should n't like to have anything brought up again about poor master; it would be like digging his corpse up again, poor man. I think I've done right."

So, through Mr. Birks's mistaken sense of delicacy, the clew that might have led to the tracing of Tom's murderers was lost.

Mr. Winter often tells the story of his friend's murder, and the moral that he draws is, that to insure his life (especially in the Legal) is a paramount duty with every prudent man.

You, kind reader, may draw any moral you please. I was in Barncoate in 1867, when I heard of the engagement of Miss Grace Bellamy, the beauty and heiress, to Adolphus Plumme, Captain 17th Plungers, and eldest son of Sir Damson Plumme, of Plumme Hall; and I trust that this piece of fashionable intelligence will be accepted as a happy ending to my tale. She has been promoted to a higher station in life, than her father, had he lived, could have hoped to see her attain. We trust, and indeed have reason to know, THAT SHE IS WORTH IT.

WEEK-DAY RELIGION.

THE spiritual hunger and thirst of aspiring natures is surely ill satisfied by the Sunday service or any other formal application of religion to daily life. Members of a Church do well to remind themselves on the universal resting-day of their mutual brotherhood and mutual faith; and, without doubt, receive inspiring consolation from the prayers, even when the sermon fails to administer counsel. But granting that no exception has been taken to existing creeds or formulas, does the seventh day's celebration furnish spiritual meat and drink for the interval between each?

In the first place, a large number of men and women are prevented from taking part in it, and, in the second place, few are so constituted as to be able to command a devotional temper at will. Again it often happens that Sunday is the only day on which the scattered members of a household meet. Very naturally the minds of all are more or less occupied with the events of the past week. Topic after topic is eagerly discussed. With difficulty the wandering thoughts are collected during church-time. A sense of relief is felt when the services are over for the day. Taking for granted, however, that the clergyman is in every way fitted for his office, and that public prayers answer every purpose for which they were intended, there still remains the need of week-day religion unprovided for. It will be urged that family prayer is a means admirably adapted to this end, bringing into spiritual contact as it does master and servant, host and guest, parent and child. But allowance must be made for such theological differences as may exist between the latter of these; and also for the numerous interruptions to which family worship is subjected. What with the absence entailed by sickness, business, or pleasure, the most methodical household cannot assemble very regularly for this purpose. When the wheels of life glide smoothly and monotonously from year to year, and hindrances of a worldly kind are not allowed to interfere with religious duties, a little leaven of formalism is but too apt to leaven the whole lump.

Secondly, it may be urged that religious books are calculated to meet the wants of week-day religion, — and that of the voluminous tracts, sermons, and discourses published annually there is both milk for babes and meat for strong men. Such interpretation as is needed for a proper understanding of the Scriptures, and such comfort as the daily trials of life require, may surely be found here by those who seek them. But hard-working men and women, who would most thankfully turn from the duties of life for a while and refresh themselves with the contemplation of spiritual things, have little time for reading of this kind. A lawyer must read law, a doctor books on medicine, and so on. Much beautiful thought and priceless counsel is thus unattainable. Of course the pure gold of secular literature is mixed with some alloy, and the books and tracts so largely distributed among the poor are not always calculated to effect the end they have in view. Still, in praise of the best of these too much cannot be said. Religion, as Mr. Lecky well says, is the one romance of the poor; and those who possess libraries but faintly comprehend what the one hymn-book or the one volume of sermons is to the cottage and the attic.

When both family worship and devotional literature fail, what remains to soothe the tired spirit and heal the troubled mind during the burden and heat of the day? Of course, we must take into account the indirect religious teaching of poets like Wordsworth and Lowell, whose noble utterances are worth all the sermons in the world, reminding us as they do that every-day existence is —

"Life, the one block
Of marble that 's vouchsafed wherefrom to carve
Our great thoughts, white and godlike to shine down
The future."

And as there are poets and poets, Mr. Tupper doubtless conveys consolation to some minds, and the moralist of the Daily Telegraph lifts others from the mire of the world to the upper heavens of sublime contemplation. But we are speaking more especially of those who need thoughts and not words, and who, when stones are given them for bread, know very well wherein the one differs from the other. Nor must the sympathy of those who have like aspirations with ourselves count for nothing. In these days, when the necessity for uprightness in dealing with the gravest spiritual and intellectual questions comes so forcibly home to every thoughtful person, the intercourse of kindred souls partakes of the nature almost of a religious communion. Salutary as it is to find noble thoughts embodied in writing worthy of it, the immediate influence of lofty ideals carried out in every-day life is far more effective and lasting. The one appeals to our imagination, the other to our conscience; and just as the most zealous religious instruction falls short of effect if not borne out by practical example, so does our faith wax cold when high thought is matched with action unworthy of it. Next to this, nothing is more apt to engender contempt for humanity and indifference to the best aims of existence than the spectacle of a life which is one long tissue of plausibilities. Where there is no higher motive to action than a love of popularity, very little respect can exist for ideals, much less for the highest realization of them; and the religion of the week-day as well as of the Sabbath becomes a dead letter. But we must remember that besides seekers after material good and the large number of seekers after truth, are multitudes who would fain make their homely and toilsome lives an expression of the best side of their natures. Too often it happens that they are not reminded of this craving for excellence by those about them, either by the nature of their occupations, or by such literature as falls in their way. When worldly losses happen, or health gives way, or children go wrong, the spirit is sorrowful unto death; another kind of stimulus is needed, namely, the stimulus of hope. The duty of hopefulness is very inadequately preached either on Sundays or week-days, though the doctrine of theoretic cheerfulness avails little so long as the Sabbath of the mass is made the dreary thing it is. Why not make our working days more religious and our Sundays less gloomy?

And this leads us to a suggestion thrown out by a correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette some time back, — that churches should be kept open during the week time. At a very trifling cost this might be effected, and we believe that few people would grudge a small sum for such a purpose. Only those who toil from morning to night, often at uncongenial work and among uncongenial fellow-workers, can understand the comfort of a little quiet and a little solitude. Now what quiet would be so soothing and what solitude so perfect as that of an empty church, orderly, well ventilated, and well warmed, as the case might be? Here would be at once a resting-place for the weary and a retreat for the troubled. The man or woman wrestling with some secret sorrow, or distracted by some secret doubt, might turn aside from the world and find comfort and guidance. Five minutes thus spent, without clergyman or prayer-book, might often prove more salutary than the most impressive Sunday service; just because the one exercise of a natural instinct is voluntary and the other forced. "An Unedified but Well-meaning Church-goer," whose letter followed that of the Pall Mall Gazette's correspondent abroad, gives a true picture of the ordinary family Sunday, and doubtless many could tell a less satisfactory story. How many people go to church not because they like it, but because they think it looks well to do so! Nothing more shocks a sincere nature than the self-deception into which religious formalism leads even intelligent and well-disposed people. The sort of superiority which orthodox church or chapel goers assume over their less exemplary neighbors is familiar to all who live in the country, and, more than anything else, provokes laxity of belief. We do not say that the opening of churches in the week-day would do away with religious shams and re-establish discarded creeds. But by enabling all who prefer it to worship after their own fashion and at their own time, it would surely minister to the inmost spiritual need of man, and thus elevate the horizon of daily life. Sadly indeed do we want a week-day religion that, appealing to the highest instincts of humanity, should infuse with a larger spirit and a higher moral tone not only our aspirations but our conduct. We need no less a little more cheerfulness and a little less formalism on Sundays.

THE DEATH OF PARIS.

BY WILLIAM MORRIS.
ARGUMENT.

Paris, the son of Priam, was wounded by one of the poisoned arrows of Hercules that Philoctetes bore to the siege of Troy; wherefore he had himself borne up into Ida that he might see the nymph Koono, whom he once had loved, because she, who knew many secret things, alone could heal him; but when he had seen her and spoken with her, she would deal with the matter in no wise, wherefore Paris died of that hurt.

In the last month of Troy's beleaguering,
When both sides, waiting for some god's great hand,
But seldom o'er the meads the war-shout sent,
Yet idle rage would sometimes drive a band
From town or tent about Troy-gate to stand
All armed, and there to bicker aimlessly;
And so at least the weary time wore by.

In such a fight, when wide the arrows flew,
And little glory fell to any there,
And naught there seemed for a stout man to do,
Rose Philoctetes from the ill-roofed lair
That hid his rage, and crept out into air,
And strung his bow, and slunk down to the fight,
"Twixt rusty helms, and shields that once were bright.

And even as he reached the foremost rank,
A glimmer as of polished steel and gold
Amid the war-worn Trojan folk, that shrink
To right and left, his fierce eyes could behold;
He heard a shout, as if one man were bold
About the streams of Simoeis that day —
One heart still ready to play out the play.

Therewith he heard a mighty bowstring twang,
And a shaft screamed 'twixt hostile band and band,
And close beside him fell, with clash and clang,
A well-trying warrior from the Cretan land,
And rolled in dust, clutching with desperate hand
At the gay feathers of the shaft that lay
Deep in his heart, well silenced from that day.

Then of the Greeks did man look upon man,
While Philoctetes from his quiver drew
A dreadful shaft, and through his fingers ran
The dull-red feathers; of strange steel and blue
The barbs were, such as archer never knew,
But black as death the thin-forged bitter point,
That with the worm's blood fate did erst anoint.

He shook the shaft, and notched it, and therewith
Forth from the Trojans rang that shout again,
Whistled the arrow, and a Greek did writhe
Once more upon the earth in his last pain;
While the gray clouds, big with the threat of rain,
Parted a space, and on the Trojans shone,
And struck a glory from that shining one.

Then Philoctetes scowled, and cried, "O Fate,
I give thee this, thy strong man gave to me.
Do with it as thou wilt! — let small or great E'en as thou wilt before its black point be!
Late grows the year, and stormy is the sea,
The oars lie rotten by the gunwales now
That nevermore a Grecian surf shall know."

He spake and drew the string with careless eyes,
And, as the shaft flew forth, he turned about
And tramped back slowly, noting in no wise
How from the Greeks uprose a joyous shout,
And from the Trojan host therewith brake out
Confused clamor, and folk cried the name
Of him wherethrough the weary struggle came,

Paris, the son of Priam! then once more
O'er head of leaguer and beleaguered town
Gray grew the sky, a cold sea-wind swept o'er
The ruined plain, and the small rain drove down,
While slowly underneath that chilling frown
Parted the hosts; sad Troy into its gates,
Greece to its tents, and waiting on the fates.

NEXT day the seaward-looking gates none swung
Back on their hinges, whatso Greek might fare,
With seeming-careless mien, and bow unstrung,
Anigh them; whatso rough-voiced horn might dare,
With well-known notes, the war-worn warders
there;
Troy slept amid its nightmares through the day,
And dull with waking dreams the leaguer lay.

Yet in the streets did man say unto man,
"Hector is dead, and Troilus is dead;
Æneas turneth toward the waters wan;
In his fair house Antenor hides his head;
Fast from the tree of Troy the boughs are shred;
And now this Paris, now this joyous one,
Is the cry cried that biddeth him begone?"

But on the morrow's dawn, ere yet the sun
Had shone athwart the mists of last night's rain,
And shown the image of the Spotless One Unto the tents and hovels of the plain
Whose girth of war she long had made all vain,
From out a postern looking towards the north
A little band of silent men went forth.

And in their midst a litter did they bear
Whereon lay one with linen wrapped around,
Whose wan face turned unto the fresher air
As though a little pleasure he had found
Amidst of pain; some dreadful torturing wound
The man endured belike, and as a balm
Was the fresh morn, with all its rest and calm,

After the weary tossing of the night
And close dim-litten chamber, whose dusk seemed Laboring with whispers fearful of the light,
Confused with images of dreams long dreamed,
Come back again, now that the lone torch gleamed
Dim before eyes that saw naught real as true
To vex the heart that naught of purpose knew.

Upon the late-passed night in e'en such wise
Had Paris lain. What time, like years of life,
Had passed before his weary heart and eyes!
What hopeless, nameless longings! what wild strife
'Gainst naught for naught, with wearying changes rife,
Had he gone through, till in the twilight gray
They bore him through the cold deserted way.

Mocking and strange the streets looked now, most meet
For a dream's ending, for a vain life's end;
While sounded his strong litter-bearers' feet,
Like feet of men who through Death's country wend
Silent, for fear lest they should yet offend
The grim King satisfied to let them go,
Hope bids them hurry, fear's chain makes them slow.

In feverish doze of time a-gone he thought,
When love was soft, life strong, and a sweet name,
The first sweet name that led him down love's ways,
Unbidden ever to his fresh lips came;
Half witting would he speak it, and for shame
Flush red, and think what folk would deem thereof
If they might know CEnone was his love.

And now, CEnone no more love of his,
He worn with war and passion — must he pray,
"O thou, I loved and love not, life and bliss
Lie in thine hands to give or take away;
O heal me, hate me not! think of the day
When as thou thinkest still, e'en so I thought,
That all the world without thy love was naught."

Yea, he was borne forth such a prayer to make,
For she alone of all the world, they said,
The thirst of that dread poison now might slake,
For midst the ancient wise ones nurtured
On peaceful Ida, in the lore long dead,
Lost to the hurrying world, right wise she was,
Mighty to bring most wondrous things to pass.

Was the world worth the minute of that prayer
If yet her love, despised and cast aside,
Should so shine forth that she should heal him there?
He knew not and he recked not; fear and pride
'Neath Helen's kiss and Helen's tears had died,
And life was love, and love too strong that he Should catch at Death to save him misery.

So, with soul drifting down the stream of love,
He let them bear him through the fresh fair morn,
From out Troy-gates; and no more now he strove
To battle with the wild dreams, newly born
From that past night of toil and pain forlorn;
No farewell did he mutter 'neath his breath
To failing Troy, no eyes he turned toward death.

Troy dwindled now behind them, and the way
That round about the feet of Ida wound
They left; and up a narrow vale, that lay,
Grassy and soft, betwixt the pine-woods bound,
They went, and ever gained the higher ground,
For as a trench the little valley was
To catch the runnels that made green its grass.

Now ere that green vale narrowed to an end,
Blocked by a shaly slip thrust bleak and bare
From the dark pine-wood's edge, as men who wend
Upon a well-known way, they turned them there,
And through the pine-wood's dusk began to fare
By blind ways, till all noise of bird and wind
Amid that odorous night was left behind.

And in mean while deepened the languid doze
That lay on Paris into slumber deep,
O'er his unconscious heart, and eyes shut close,
The image of that very place 'gan creep,
And twelve years younger in his dreamful sleep,
Light-footed, through the awful wood he went,
With beating heart, on lovesome thoughts intent.

Dreaming, he went, till thinner and more thin,
And bright with growing day, the pine-wood grew,
Then to an open rugged space did win;
Whence a close beech-wood was he passing through,
Whose every tall white stem full well he knew;
Then seemed to stay awhile for loving shame,
When to the brow of the steep bank he came,

Where still the beech-trunks o'er the mast-strewn ground
Stood close, and slim and tall, but hid not quite
A level grassy space they did surround
On every side save one, that to the light
Of the clear western sky, cold now, but bright,
Was open, and the thought of the far sea,
Toward which a small brook tinkled merrily.

Him seemed he lingered there, then stepped adown
With troubled heart into the soft green place,
And up the eastmost of the beech-slopes brown
He turned about a lonesome, anxious face,
And stood to listen for a little space
If any came, but naught he seemed to hear
Save the brook's babble, and the beech-leaves' stir.

And then he dreamed great longing o'er him came;
Too great, too bitter of those days to be Long past, when love was born amidst of shame;
He dreamed that, as he gazed full eagerly
Into the green dusk between tree and tree,
His trembling hand slid down the horn to take Wherewith he erst was wont his herd to wake.

Trembling, he set it to his lips, and first Breathed gently through it; then strained hard to blow,
For dumb, dumb was it grown, and no note burst
From its smooth throat; and ill thoughts poisoned now
The sweetness of his dream; he murmured low,
"Ah! dead and gone, and ne'er to come again;
Ah, past away! ah, longed for long in vain!"

"Lost love, sweet Helen, come again to me!"
Therewith he dreamed he fell upon the ground
And hid his face, and wept out bitterly,
But woke with fall and torturing tears, and found

He lay upon his litter, and the sound
Of feet departing from him did he hear,
And rustling of the last year's leaves anear.

But in the self-same place he lay indeed,
Weeping and sobbing, and scarce knowing why;
His hand clutched hard the horn that erst did lead
The dew-lapped neat round Ida merrily;
He strove to raise himself, he strove to cry
That name of Helen once, but then withal
Upon him did the load of memory fall.

Quiet he lay a space, while o'er him drew
The dull, chill cloud of doubt and sordid fear,
As now he thought of what he came to do,
And what a dreadful minute drew anear;
He shut his eyes, and now no more could hear
His litter-bearers' feet; as lone he felt
As though amid the outer wastes he dwelt.

Amid that fear a minute naught and vain
His life and love seemed; with a dreadful sigh
He raised his arm, and soul's and body's pain
Tore at his heart with new-born agony
As a thin quivering note: a ghost-like cry
Rang from the long-unused lips of the horn,
Spoiling the sweetness of the happy morn.

He let the horn fall down upon his breast
And lie there, and his hand fell to his side;
And there indeed his body seemed to rest,
But restless was his soul, and wandered wide
Through a dim maze of lusts unsatisfied;
Thoughts half thought out, and words half said,
and deeds
Half done, unfruitful, like o'ershadowed weeds.

His eyes were shut now, and his dream's hot tears
Were dry upon his cheek; the sun grown high
Had slain the wind, when smote upon his ears
A sudden rustling in the beech-leaves dry;
Then came a pause; then footsteps drew anigh
O'er the deep grass; he shuddered, and in vain
He strove to turn, despite his burning pain.

Then through his half-shut eyes he seemed to see
A woman drawing near, and held his breath,
And clutched at the white linen eagerly,
And felt a greater fear than fear of death,
A greater pain than that love threateneth,
As soft low breathing o'er his head he heard,
And thin fine linen raiment gently stirred.

Then spoke a sweet voice close, ah, close to him?
"Thou sleepest, Paris? would that I could sleep!
On the hill-side do I lay limb to limb,
And lie day-long watching the shadows creep
And change, till day is gone, and night is deep,
Yet sleep not ever, wearied with the thought
Of all a little lapse of time has brought.

"Sleep, though thou calledst me! yet mid thy dream
Hearken the while I tell about my life, —
The life I led while mid the steely gleam
Thou wert made happy with the joyous strife;
Or in the soft arms of the Greek king's wife
Wouldst still moan out that day had come too soon, Calling the dawn the glimmer of the moon.

"Wake not, wake not, before the tale is told!
Not long to tell, the tale of those ten years!
A gnawing pain that never groweth old,
A pain that shall not be washed out by tears;
A dreary road the weary foot-sole wears,
Knowing no rest, but going to and fro,
Treading it harder 'neath the weight of woe.

"No middle, no beginning, and no end;
No staying place, no thought of anything,
Bitter or sweet, with that one thought to blend;
No least joy left that I away might fling
And deem myself grown great; no hope to cling
About me, naught but dull, unresting pain,
That made all memory sick, all striving vain.

"Thou — hast thou thought thereof, perchance anights
— In early dawn, and shuddered, and then said,
'Alas, poor soul! yet hath she had delights,
For none are wholly hapless but the dead.'
Liar! O liar! my woe upon thine head,
My agony that naught can take away!
Awake, arise, O traitor, unto day!"

Her voice rose as she spoke, till loud and shrill
It rang about the place; but when at last
She ended, and the echoes from the hill,
Woful and wild, back o'er the place were cast,
From her lost love a little way she passed
Trembling and looking round as if afeared
At those ill sounds that through the morn she heard.

Then still she stood, her clenched hands, slim and white,
Relaxed, her drawn brow smoothed; with a great sigh
Her breast heaved, and she muttered, "Ere the light
Of yesterday had faded from the sky
I knew that he would seek me certainly;
And, knowing it, yet feigned I knew it not,
Or with what hope, what hope my heart was hot.

"That tumult in my breast I might not name —
Love should I call it? — nay, my life was love
And pain these ten years, — should I call it shame?
What shame my weary waiting might reprove After ten years? — or pride? — what pride could move
After ten years this heart within my breast?
Alas! I lied — I lied, and called it rest.

"I called it rest, and wandered through the night;
Upon my river's flowery bank I stood,
And thought its hurrying changing black and white
Stood still beneath the moon, that hill and wood
Were moving round me, and I deemed it good
The world should change so, deemed it good that day
Forever into night had passed away.

"And still I wandered through the night, and still Things changed, and changed not round me, and the day —
This day wherein I am, had little will
With dreadful truth to drive the night away, —
God knows if for its coming I did pray!
God knows if at the last in twilight-tide
My hope — my hope undone I more might hide."

Then looked she toward the litter as she spake,
And slowly drew anigh it once again,
And from her worn tried heart there did outbreak
Wild sobs and weeping, shameless of its pain,
Till as the storm of passion 'gan to wane
She looked and saw the shuddering misery
Wherein her love of the old days did lie.

Still she wept on, but gentler now withal,
And passed on till above the bier she stood,
Watching the well-wrought linen rise and fall
Beneath his faltering breath, and still her blood
Ran fiery hot with thoughts of ill and good,
Pity and scorn, and love and hate, as she,
Half dead herself, gazed on his misery.

At last she spake: "This tale I told e'en now, Know'st thou mid dreams what woman suffered this?"

Canst thou not dream of the old days, and how Full oft thy lips would say 'twixt kiss and kiss
That all of bliss was not enough of bliss
My loveliness and kindness to reward,
That for thy Love the sweetest life was hard?

"Yea, Paris, have I not been kind to thee?
Did I not live thy wishes to fulfil?
Wert thou not happy when thou lovedst me?
What dream then did we have of change or ill?
Why must thou needs change? I am unchanged still;

I need no more than thee — what needest thou
But that we might be happy, yea, e'en now?"

He opened hollow eyes and looked on her,
And stretched a trembling hand out; ah, who knows
With what strange mingled look of hope and fear,
Of hate and love, their eyes met! Come so close
Once more, that everything they now might lose
Amid the flashing out of that old fire,
The short-lived uttermost of all desire.

He spake not, shame and other love there lay
Too heavy on him; but she spake again:
"E'en now at the beginning of the day,
Weary with hope and fear and restless pain,
I said, Alas, I said, if all be vain
And he will have no pity, yet will I Have pity; how shall kindness e'er pass by?"

He drew his hand aback, and laid it now
Upon the swathings of his wound; but she Set her slim hand upon her knitted brow
And gazed on him with bright eyes eagerly;
Nor cruel looked her lips that once would be
So kind, so longed for: neither spake awhile,
Till in her face there shone a sweet strange smile.

She touched him not, but yet so near she came
That on his very face he felt her breath;
She whispered: "Speak! — thou wilt not speak for shame;
I will not grant for love, and gray-winged Death
Meanwhile above our folly hovereth;
Speak! was it not all false? is it not done?
Is not the dream dreamed out, the dull night gone?"

"Hearkenest thou, Paris? O, look kind on me!
I hope no more indeed, but couldst thou turn
Kind eyes to me, then much for me and thee
Might love do yet. Doh not the old fire burn?
Doth not thine heart for words of old days yearn?
Canst thou not say, Alas, what wilt thou say,
Since I have not by hope for many a day?"

"Paris, I hope no more, yet while ago —
Take it not ill if I must needs say this —
A while ago I cried, Ah! no, no, no!
It is no love at all, this love of his;
He loves her not; I it was had the bliss
Of being the well-beloved; dead is his love,
For surely none but I his heart may move."

She wept still; but his eyes grew wild and strange
With that last word, and harder his face grew,
Though her tear-blinded eyes saw not the change.
Long beat about his heart false words and true,
A veil of strange thought he might not pierce through,
Of hope he might not name, clung round about
His wavering heart, perplexed with death and doubt.

Then trembling did he speak: "I love thee still, Surely I love thee." But a dreadful pain
Shot through his heart, and strange presage of ill,
As, like the ceasing of the summer rain,
Her tears stopped, and she drew aback again,
Silent a moment, till a bitter cry
Burst from her lips grown white with agony.

A look of pity came across his face
Despite his pain and horror, and her eyes
Saw it, and changed, and for a little space
Panting she stood, as one checked by surprise
Amidst of passion: then in tender wise,
Kneeling, she 'gan the bandages undo
That hid the place the bitter shaft tore through.

Then when the wound and his still face and white
Lay there before her, she 'gan tremble sore,
For images of hope and past delight,
Not to be named once, 'gan her heart flit o'er;
Blossomed the longing in her heart, and bore
A dreadful thought of uttermost despair,
That all if gained would be no longer fair.

In dull, low words she spake: "Yea, so it is,
That thou art near thy death, and this thy wound
I yet may heal, and give thee back what bliss
The ending of thy life may yet surround:
Mock not thyself with hope! the Trojan ground
Holds tombs, not houses now; all gods are gone
From out your temples but cold Death alone.

"Lo, if I heal thee, and thou goest again Back unto Troy, and she, thy new love, sees Thy lovable body freed from all its pain,
And yet awhile amid the miseries
Of Troy ye twain lie loving, well at ease,
Yet midst of this while she is asking thee
What kind soul made thee whole and well to be,

"And thou art holding back my name with lies,
And thinking, maybe, Paris, of this face, —
E'en then the Greekish flame shall sear your eyes,
The clatter of the Greeks fill all the place,
While she, my woe, the ruin of thy race,
Looking toward changed days, a new crown shall stand,
Her fingers trembling in her husband's hand.

"Thou I called love once, wilt thou die e'en thus,
Ruined midst ruin, ruining bereft
Of name and honor? O love, piteous
That but for this were all the hard things left
That lay 'twixt us and love; till naught was left 'Twixt thy lips and my lips! O, hard that we Were once so full of all felicitate!"

"O love, O Paris, know'st thou this of me, —
That in these hills e'en such a name I have
As being akin to a divinity?
And lightly may I slay and lightly save;
Nor know I surely if the peaceful grave
Shall ever hide my body dead; behold,
Have ten long years of misery made me old?"

Sadly she laughed; and rising wearily
Stood by him in the fresh and sunny morn;
The image of his youth and faith gone by
She seemed to be, for one short minute born
To make his shamed lost life seem more forlorn;
He shut his eyes and moaned, but once again
She knelt beside him, and the weary pain

Deepened upon her face. "Hearken!" she said,
"Death is anear thee; is then death so ill
With me anigh thee — since Troy is as dead,
Ere many tides the Xanthus' mouth shall fill,
And thou art rest of her that harmed me still,
Whatsome may change — shall I heal thee for this,
That thou mayst die more mad for her last kiss?"

She gazed at him with straining eyes; and he,
Despite himself love touched his dying heart
And from his eyes desire flashed suddenly,
And o'er his wan face the last blood did start
As with soft love his close-shut lips 'gan part.
She laughed out bitterly, and said, "Why then Must I needs call thee falsest of all men,

"Seeing thou liest not to save thy life? —
Yet listen once again: fair is this place
That knew not the beginning of the strife
And recked not of its end, and this my face,
This body thou wouldst day-long once embrace
And deem thyself right happy — thine it is,
Thine only, Paris, shouldst thou deem it bliss."

He looked into her eyes, and deemed he saw
A strange and awful look a-gathering there,
And sick scorn at her quivering fine lip draw;
Yet trembling he stretched out his hand to her,
Although self-loathing and strange hate did tear
His heart that Death made cold, e'en as he said,
"Whatsome thou wilt shall be remembered;

"Whatsome thou wilt, O love, shall be forgot, —
It may be I shall love thee as of old."
As thunder laughs she laughed; "Nay, touch me not!
Touch me not, fool!" she cried. "Thou grow'st
a-cold,
And I am Death, Death, Death! — the tale is told
Of all thy days! of all those joyous days
When thinking naught of me thou garneredst praise."

"Turn back again, and think no more of me!
I am thy Death! woe for thy happy days!
For I must slay thee: ah, my misery!
Woe for the godlike wisdom thou wouldst praise!
Else I my love to life again might raise
A minute, ah, a minute! and be glad While on my lips thy blessing lips I had?"

"Would God that it were yesterday again;
Would God the red sun had died yester-eve,
And I were no more hapless now than then!
Would God that I could say, and not believe,
As yesterday, that years past hope did leave
My cold heart, — that I lived a death in life!
Ah! then within my heart was yet a strife!

"But now, but now, is all come to an end —
Nay, speak not; think not of me! think of her
Who made me this; and back unto her wend,
Lest her lot, too, should be yet heavier!
I will depart for fear thou diest here,
Lest I should see thy woful ghost forlorn
Here wandering ever 'twixt the night and morn.

"— O heart grown wise, wilt thou not let me go?
Will ye be never satisfied, O eyes,
With gazing on my misery and my woe?
O foolish, quivering heart, now grown so wise,
What folly is it that from out thee cries
To be all close to him once more, once more Ere yet the dark stream cleaveth shore from shore?"

Her voice was a wail now, with quivering hand
At her white raiment did she clutch and tear
Unwitting, as she rose up and did stand
Bent over his wide eyes and pale face, where
No torturing hope was left, no pain, or fear;
For Death's cold rest was gathering fast on him,
And toward his heart crept over foot and limb.

A little while she stood, and spake no word,
But hung above him, with white heaving breast,
And moaning still as moans the gray-winged bird
In autumn-tide o'er his forgotten nest;
And then her hands about her throat she pressed,
As though to keep a cry back, then stooped down
And set her face to his, while spake her moan:

"O love, O cherished more than I can tell,
Through years of woe, O love, my life and bane,
My joy and grief, farewell, farewell, farewell!
Forgetfulness of grief I yet may gain;
In some wise may come ending to my pain;
It may be yet the gods will have me glad!
Yet, love, I would that thee and pain I had!

"Alas! it may not be, it may not be,
The falling blossom of the late spring-tide,
Shall hang a golden globe upon the tree
When through the vale the mists of autumn glide;
Yet would, O Love, with thee I might abide.
Now, now that restful death is drawing nigh —
Farewell, farewell, how good it is to die!"

O strange, O strange, when on his lips once more
Her lips were laid! O strange that he must die
Now, when so clear a vision had come o'er
His failing heart, and keenest memory
Had shown him all his changing life passed by;
And what he was, and what he might have been,
Yea, and should be, perchance, so clear were seen!

Yea, then were all things laid within the scale, —
Pleasure and lust, love and desire of fame,
Kindness, and hope, and folly, — all the tale
Told in a moment, as across him came
That sudden flash, bright as the lightning-flame, Showing the wanderer on the waste how he
Has gone astray mid dark and misery.

Ah, and her face upon his dying face
That the sun warmed no more! that agony
Of dying love, wild with the tale of days Long past, and strange with hope that might not be —
All was gone now, and what least part had he
In Love at all, and why was life all gone?
Why must he meet the eyes of death alone?

Alone, for she and ruth had left him there ;
 Alone, because the ending of the strife
 He knew, well taught by death, drew surely near ;
 Alone, for all those years with pleasure rife
 Should be a tale mid Helen's coming life,
 And she and all the world should go its ways,
 Midst other troubles, other happy days.

And yet how was it with him ? As if death
 Strove yet with struggling life and love in vain,
 With eyes grown deadly bright and rattling breath,
 He raised himself, while wide his blood did stain
 The linen fair, and seized the horn again,
 And blew thereon a wild and shattering blast
 Ere from his hand afar the thing he cast.

Then, as a man who in a failing fight
 For a last onset gathers suddenly
 All soul and strength, he faced the summer light,
 And from his lips broke forth a mighty cry
 Of "Helen, Helen, Helen !" — yet the sky
 Changed not above his cast-back golden head,
 And merry was the world, though he was dead.

BUT now when every echo was as still
 As were the lips of Paris once more came
 The litter-bearers down the beech-clad hill
 And stood about him crying out his name,
 Lamenting for his beauty and his fame,
 His love, his kindness, and his merry heart,
 That still would thrust ill days and thoughts apart.

Homeward they bore him through the dark woods' gloom
 With heavy hearts presaging nothing good,
 And when they entered Troy again, a tomb
 For them and theirs it seemed — Long has it stood,
 But now indeed the labor and the blood,
 The love, the patience, and good heart are vain, —
 The Greeks may have what yet is left to gain.

I CANNOT tell what crop may clothe the hills, —
 The merry hills Troy whitened long ago ;
 Belike the sheaves, wherewith the reaper fills
 His yellow wain, no whit the weaker grow
 For that past harvest-tide of wrong and woe ;
 Belike the tale, wept over elsewhere,
 Of those old days is clean forgotten there.

THE PLAY OF THE PERIOD.

If any young person of either sex desires to succeed upon the stage, that young person is advised to practise, not elocution, but gymnastics. Actors and actresses of established reputation feel some difficulty in performing those feats of bodily activity in which the sensational drama of the period is so prolific. The saying of the elder Mr. Weller, that width and wisdom go together, is only too true in England. Mental maturity is apt to be accompanied by rotundity of figure, and it is rather hard upon an actor who has been dying all his life by the old methods to be called upon to jump from a house-top or into the Thames, or else to abdicate his professional position. The ladies who are required to incur all the various risks of fire and flood labor under the additional disadvantage of having to take care, not only of their limbs, but of their clothes. If a modern manager cannot put appropriate words into a girl's mouth, he knows that he can put a fashionable dress upon her back, and he properly makes the utmost use of the resources which money can command. An actress may do anything on earth, in air, or water, — and the more surprising it is the better, — provided only that while doing it she will remember that she is engaged to illustrate not so much human nature as Parisian fashions. We laugh at the picture of Garrick playing Macbeth in a court suit, but it is equally absurd to see a modern actress scrambling over house-tops in the sort of dress which she would wear if she were going out to make a morning call. Of course, if she wears a lady's dress, she must wear it as a lady does. There is a story of a king of Spain who was on fire, and could not be put out because the only person who happened to be near had not been regularly introduced at Court. This story is paralleled at the Adelphi Theatre, where a girl proceeds with so much deliberation to rescue her lover from a burning house that we fear that while the lady is arranging the skirts of her dress the gentleman will be a trifle overdone. It seems, in fact, to be a question between Coram and decorum, and the authors of the piece have properly considered that a young woman of well-regulated mind would prefer the latter. Messrs. Boucicault and Byron deserve the gratitude of all fathers and mothers of families for the lesson they have thus inculcated upon young ladies, of graceful deportment and the avoidance of undue haste in moving to the assistance of a lover upon the roofs of burning houses.

The difficulties under which the sensational drama has to be performed receive additional illustration from a piece lately produced at the Princess's Theatre. Mr. Vining being manager of this theatre, and also an actor of established reputation, deems it due to himself to be thrown from Putney Bridge into the Thames. The scenic artists have been lately smitten with an aquatic passion, and we hope before the theatrical season closes to see a representation of a murder or a suicide at every bridge upon the river. The painter employed at the Princess's seems to aim at combining the real with the ideal, after the manner of Turner. He gives us the identical timber work of Putney Bridge, and below it is a promontory or island supporting a public-house and drinking-garden, while above it stands on the ground occupied by the London Rowing Club, an aristocratic villa. The artist has treated the river as some painters do the human countenance. They take the actual heavy features of the sitter, and give them an imaginary expression of intellectual life. Mr. Lloyds perhaps thought that if there was no beer sold in midstream of the Thames there ought to be, and so he has taken our old friend the Crab Tree, floated it down the river, and anchored it below the bridge. The result of this arrangement is, that when Bullhead is thrown over the bridge, the young woman who serves beer is able to come promptly to his rescue with a boat. It is, of course, only too manifest that Gentleman Jack could not throw Bullhead over the bridge if Bullhead were not willing to be thrown, and also that the faculty of falling, or pretending to fall, without being hurt is not possessed by the actor who performs Bullhead to any more than a very moderate extent. An English actor does not attain the position of Mr. Vining without his friends being aware that he is neither so young nor so agile as he was. It is rather an alarming prospect for theatrical aspirants to know that the higher they rise the further and oftener they will have to fall. The business of being thrown over the bridge is done very creditably by Mr. Vining, but it can only be done at all by limiting the height from which he is to fall. He palpably climbs down, and, if there are any people who are able to believe that he falls, we envy them their capacity for being amused. The character of Gentleman Jack is played by Mr. Charles Mathews, and we must congratulate that popular actor on having attained, after a long and arduous career upon the stage, to the honorable position of Head Murderer. To this complexion must we come at last. There is perhaps no living actor who is more associated with memories of light comedy and the higher class of farce, and yet the sensational drama has now marked him for its own. We read all that the newspapers have to tell us about the Wood Green tragedy, and find to our disappointment that they have nothing fresh to tell us about the Pantin massacre, and then we go to the Princess's Theatre to see a murder committed by Mr. Charles Mathews.

The French author of the piece from which Escaped from Portland is adapted is entitled to the credit of having produced something decidedly new in murder. An escaped convict, who is called by his professional brethren Gentleman Jack, visits an invalid lady in the assumed character of a temporary substitute for the family doctor. The Countess of Blazonfield is seen reclining on a sofa, and the pretended doctor as he feels her pulse changes a bottle which stands on her table for another bottle which he has brought with him. He then retires, and the countess uses the contents of the new bottle, which immediately produce the desired effect. The countess dies visibly before our very eyes, while the murderer awaits outside the door the completion of his work, and then reappears and carries away the bottle which would be evidence of the use of poison. We appreciate the satire thus conveyed upon the medical profession. A sham doctor murders the patient of a real doctor, and the counterfeit is so like the genuine practice of the profession that the real doctor does not detect the difference. In fact, the countess was killed so neatly that a regular practitioner need not have been ashamed to have done the job. But why the countess was killed, except for the display of the murderer's ingenuity in killing her, we have not the smallest notion. Perhaps the murder is only committed in the first act in order that it may be found out in the last, and we suppose that a play thus planned claims for itself to have a moral. We are ourselves doubtful as to the morality of the play, but we are ready to testify that it is religious; for there is a lady in it who seems to have nothing to do except to look pretty and to pray for the other personages in the drama. Indeed, she declares her intention of praying, not only for the live earl and his children, but for the dead countess, and we think that the attention of some of our Protestant contemporaries ought to be directed to the attempt that is thus made to insinuate Romish superstition at our theatres. It was a happy conception of the author to make the earl's daughter suspect this elegant and saintly lady of murdering her mother. We should as soon have expected to hear that Miss Burdett Coutts had forged a check, or that Mr. Charles Mathews of Patter versus Clatter had turned heavy villain. However, the earl's daughter does suspect of murder the very woman with whom both the earl and the earl's son are violently in love, and thus we get a delightful complication. It is almost as nice to be at the Princess's Theatre as it was to be in Paris when everybody believed that the Kincks father and son had helped Traupmann to murder the Kincks mother and children. The only drawback to the thrilling effect of this drama is that we cannot possibly believe that Mr. Charles Mathews either could commit a murder or would be hanged for it if he did. Even the striking of the midnight clock does not produce upon our mind the awful effect that could be desired; for the entrance of Mr. Mathews irresistibly recalls the same incident in the Critic, and we seem somehow to be dreaming that Mr. Mathews is making fun of his own performance. But still, if we had a properly constituted mind, we should be impressed with the solemnity of the moment when the pious lady departs to a midnight service on New Year's eve, promising as she goes off to pray for the countess, whom she leaves in her solitary chamber. And to think that this pious lady is afterwards suspected of having contrived the murder of the countess at that very moment! This really is the sweetest thing in crime that ever was put upon the stage.

Beginning thus with a murder, we proceed to the attempted drowning of the detective Bullhead, by the convict; and afterwards we get a stabbing of the same by the same, and a general scrimmage of policemen and thieves ending in the capture of the convict. The stabbing is, we think, decidedly disappointing, and we do hope that Mr. Vining will be moved by our present complaint to give us a little blood for our money. After going to so much expense as he has in getting up this play he need not grudge a hap'orth of red paint. There has probably been no piece like this since Jack Sheppard of thirty years ago, and if ever there were a murderer at all like Mr. Charles Mathews, it must have been the courtly and vivacious Claude Duval who carved his name on the dungeon-stone at Newgate. We ought perhaps to apologize for calling Claude Duval a murderer, for we dare say he never took human life unless in obedience to the exigencies of his profession of a highwayman. Jack Sheppard, we believe, never took human life at all, and yet he was a tolerably picturesque criminal, and when he was made the hero of a drama, the audience followed the story of his escapes with an interest which some censors declared to be unwholesome. But by the help of our French friends we have changed all that. The only difference between the career of Jack Sheppard and that of Gentleman Jack is that the latter is not nearly so exciting, and yet it is supposed to form a suitable entertainment for the theatre where for many years Charles Kean produced Shakespeare. We do not know whether the dialogue which connects the sensational scenes of Escaped from Portland belongs to the French author or the English adapter, but we will say that for feebleness and inanity we could hardly find an equal to it. And thus we return to the old complaint of the poverty of the dramatic literature of the age. The adapter has been too modest to give his name, and the manager evidently considers him a less important person than the dressmaker. He really ought to be called before the curtain to receive appropriate recognition as the writer of the poorest stuff ever spoken in a theatre. Let any person who can write short-hand go to the Princess's Theatre and take down what he hears, and let him compare it with any conversation which he may happen to hear next day, and he will find, perhaps to his astonishment, that he and all his friends and acquaintances have been talking dramatic dialogue all their lives without knowing it.

"I am going to take a walk." "Take your umbrella, and come back in time for dinner."

It is no exaggeration to say that this is the sort of composition that is thought good enough for the Princess's Theatre. The adapter has been pleased to make the most wooden of all the figures which he manipulates a barrister, and to call him Mr. Brightside, quasi lucens a non lucendo. He not only is a barrister, but he becomes a Queen's counsel and a police magistrate, and for stupidity and imbecility he would vainly seek his fellow on the ancient or modern stage. Not that the adapter means to make him stupid or imbecile, for he evidently designs that he should behave as much like a lawyer and a magistrate as is consistent with his sitting on a stool and listening while the detective conducts the examination, which ends, as we are to suppose, in the committal of Gentleman Jack for murder. To use an expressive vulgarity, Mr. Brightside looks as if he could not help it during this scene; and when we are told that this idiot is a lawyer and a magistrate, we wonder whether the piety of the lady, the crimes of the convict, and the sagacity and learning of the Queen's counsel are all equally imaginary. It is considered necessary to make a sort of moral ending to the play, and so Bullhead, the detective, points to Gentleman Jack, and tells Mr. Brightside that that man possessed industry and ability which might have adorned the Bench on which it is Mr. Brightside's ambition to sit. It is possible that Gentleman Jack might make a good judge, but we are sure that Mr. Brightside would be a very unsuccessful pickpocket. He is not clever enough to get into Portland, to say nothing of getting out of it; and when the earl's daughter says that she looks to him to unravel the fearful mystery of her mother's death, we feel that this part of the play at least is true to every-day life. It is a beautiful provision of nature that girls will believe that the stupid men to whom they are engaged are clever.

NEW ELEGIES.

OUR literature is rich in elegiac poetry but poor in elegies. The distinction here implied is of course arbitrary, is perhaps fanciful, but is, as we think, justifiable. The Lycidas of Milton created the standard for English elegy. In order to be an elegy a poem must in kind and quality approach that standard. Adopting this theory, it will be admitted that but few of the elegiac compositions labelled with the distinguishing title possess any legitimate claim to it.

Chiefest among elegiac poems, as distinguished from elegies, is the "In Memoriam" of Mr. Tennyson. And the list of illustrious weepers, stretching back from our laureate's time to the dawn of English poetry, is long and various. There is scarcely a singer among them all upon whom a great sadness has not fallen. One after another they have stood by a closed tomb, strewing "rose or rue or laurel" above the ashes of a friend. To Shakespeare the sad occasion came. Ben Jonson, in a strain which has been taken up and exhausted in our own time, bewailed the lost one.

"Among that faithful troop am I;
Who as an offering at your shrine
Have sung this hymn, and here entreat
One spark of your diviner heat
To light upon a love like mine."

Dryden's first appearance was as a mourner. And Pope's facility for weeping in measure and to order was a thing beautiful to contemplate, and edifying withal. Although the elegiac poem usually celebrates the poet's grief for a dead friend, it has not always so lofty a theme. Coleridge soared to elegize an ass; and the bard who found fault with him for so far forgetting the dignity of the Muse, did himself soar to elegize a Newfoundland dog. That poem which to the general English reader is most of all associated with the word "elegy" celebrates grief for no friend whatever,—human, or asinine, or canine; we mean Gray's Elegy.

Although so many singers have wept in numbers, it has been reserved for the very few to achieve an elegy. We have at least two undoubted elegies, the Lycidas of Milton and the Adonais of Shelley. In recent years two poems have been written which the coming generations must surely rank as worthy of a place beside those two undoubted compositions. The first of them is Thyrsis, by Mr. Arnold, the second of them Ave atque Vale, by Mr. Swinburne. The object of this article is to criticize in a somewhat crude way these new elegies.

The attempt to characterize in a few words or sentences the writings of an era we take to be one of the highest exploits of criticism, the successful attempt so to do one of its greatest achievements. True of literature generally, this is in a restricted sense particularly true of poetry. When, however, we compare the poetry of our own time with that of preceding periods, the comparison forces the admission that the characterization of it is not so considerable an achievement after all. This is the Tennysonian era. With the exception of Lord Byron, probably no poet has been during his lifetime more famous than the present laureate. Daily are his praises sung from Dan even unto Beersheba. And so long as his admirers, among whom we gladly rank ourselves, content themselves with appreciative and critical admiration, we have nothing to say. But admiration has degenerated into semi-idolatry. Evinces itself by demanding autographs, and by making persistent attempts to beat its way into the laureate's back-garden. Evinces itself in exalting the triviallest act of the great man into an important episode—into a national event. The smallest morsels of information concerning the poet's private life are sought after with an astonishing avidity. Ever and anon does the poet whet the appetite of his followers by conveying to them such morsels with his own hand. About a year ago were we not fired with indignation on learning that some impious scribbler had sent him a spiteful letter? And our indignation had scarce time to cool ere we were filled with apprehension on learning that Mr. Tennyson had been foolish enough to stand "on a tower in the wet," without an umbrella, and at twelve o' the night, which act at his time of life was, to say the very least of it, imprudent. The most fatal result of this excess of uncritical admiration for perhaps the greatest and certainly the most popular poet of his time, has been the suspicion with which fresh claimants have been regarded. We think that this fatal result has been particularly evident in the case of Mr. Arnold and Mr. Swinburne,—more particularly in the case of the latter.

Mr. Tennyson's influence over the Philistine mind has here begotten not only suspicion, but positive aversion. Again, both poets have had the misfortune at an early period to be measured by the Paternoster-Row standard, — measured and found wanting. Paternoster Row is the Mount Sinai of the British Philistine. When Sinai thunders, Philistia trembles in its remotest boundary. And it is strange to reflect that of these two poets, round whose heads the thunders throbbed, the one had written "Empedocles on Etna," and the other "Atalanta in Calydon."

Thyrsis first appeared in Macmillan's Magazine for April, 1866, and is included in the volume entitled "New Poems," by Matthew Arnold, published last year. He calls it "A Monody to commemorate the author's friend, Arthur Hugh Clough, who died at Florence, 1861." Mr. Swinburne's Ave atque Vale appeared in the Fortnightly Review for January, 1868, and is "in memory of Charles Baudelaire."

Both these poems afford excellent examples of the manner of their authors, — of their strength and of their weakness. In both poems there are points of resemblance equalled in number only by the points of dissimilarity. The spirit of the poets is the same; the same love of the old Greek days; the same aversion to Philistinism and its deeds. But of the two, the truer Grecian is Mr. Arnold. He may not feel so strongly, — he may not have as large an inspiration of the divine afflatus. But his achieved result is a perfectly proportioned thing, tried in every line. There is a calm dignity in the flow of it. It is a perfect work of art. A sculptured memorial of faultless outline in memory of Thyrsis fresh from the hand of Phidias. Swinburne's, on the other hand, resembles rather a gorgeous mausoleum, carved inside and out with glorious visions, only possible to the born poet. Leaving these particular compositions, and regarding the works of the two poets generally, may we not carry the comparison further? There is a vast difference between the panorama of their works, — a difference which excites surprise only when one reflects how similar the poets are in spirit, and that from the same source their inspiration appears to be drawn. I trust that in using the word "panorama of their works" I am not guilty of an expression so uncritical as to be unintelligible. I mean to convey by it simply the picture of the series of pictures produced by these artists, apart altogether from treatment.

Arnold leads us oftenest by the banks of quiet streams, where the water-flags kiss the wavelet, and where overhead is joyous melody of birds. The shepherds recline in the meadows, and the place is flooded with the music of their pipes. Swinburne, hating with a perfect hatred anything that pertains in the smallest degree to the idyllic school, leads us by the edges of dark seas, where angry waves eat into a barren shore, where we look on the ripple of rain, or hear hollow thunders through the hot night. Never does he show us a simple village maiden; we must always gaze on the perfect beauty of the Venus, — on the huge limbs of the Titans. We are led by no trickling brook, under no lengthening hedgerows. We move under black cliffs, and stand with our faces turned straight on "the blown wet face of the sea." In articles on criticism, Mr. Arnold cries for more urbanity in critical writings. That urbanity is just what he possesses in large measure, and is that in which Mr. Swinburne is deficient. If, however, Mr. Swinburne had more urbanity he would write less true poetry.

But to get back to our elegies.

The Thyrsis, it appears to us, is chiefly remarkable for the wonderful manner in which the poet has succeeded in clothing English scenes in a sort of classic garb. The humdrum circumstance of village life is elevated — glorified. All the places among which Thyrsis moved, ere yet "God's finger touched him," are reproduced, and the same-nesses and changes in them marked and commented upon with a tender grace: —

"How changed is here each spot man makes or fills!
In the two Hinckseys nothing keeps the same;
The village street its haunted mansion lacks,
And from the sign is gone Sibylla's name,
And from the roofs the twisted chimney stacks."

Notwithstanding the unfortunate second line of this opening stanza of the Elegy, — in which "Hinckseys" strikes the ear as strange and unmusical, and in which "keeps the same" displays a desire to sacrifice correctness of expression to the exigencies of metre, — nothing can be more delicate and touching than these opening sentences. We are at once in sympathy with the poet. We see exactly what he sees, because he makes us move beside him. Mr. Arnold possesses in a large measure that power which is the laureate's greatest, and which one of the laureate's critics (Mr. Brimley) has very properly denominated presentative power. It is the power of presenting in a few well-chosen words the salient features of a landscape. In Tennyson's "Morte d'Arthur" we have the finest illustration of it. In the poem now under consideration an illustration scarcely less fine; and with this difference, that here, while the spirit of Thyrsis haunts them, they are not mere English fields.

How forcibly this strikes us in the following lines: —

"Too rare, too rare, grow now my visits here;
But once I knew each field, each flower, each stick,
And with the country-folk acquaintance made,
By barn in threshing time, by new-built rick.
Here, too, our shepherd pipes we first assayed.
Ah, me! this many a year
My pipe is lost, my shepherd's holiday
Needs must I lose them, needs with heavy heart,
Into the world and ware of men depart;
But Thyrsis of his own will went away."

In a recent essay, Mr. Helps, the talented author of "Friends in Council," warns his readers as to how they deal with adjectival power. The choice of adjectives is one of the nicest matters in composition. And, of course, in the writings of such a man as Arnold, we expect the most suitable and just use of qualifying words. We expect, and are not disappointed: —

"So, some tempestuous morn in early June,
When the year's primal burst of bloom is o'er,
Before the roses and the longest day,
When garden walks and all the grassy floor,
With blossoms red and white of fallen May,
And chestnut flowers are strewn —
So have I heard the cuckoo's parting cry
From the wet field, through the wet garden trees,
Come with the volleying rain and tossing breeze:
The bloom is gone and with the bloom go I."

On first reading these lines, this thought strikes one: "What a number of adjectives!" And one is at once then led to suppose that there are too many, — that the sentences are overstocked with them. But on reperusal who dare hint at alteration? Which of us would willingly erase the picture which stretches before us: "the wet fields," "the wet garden-trees," "the volleying rain," "the tossing breeze"?

Again, in the following lines, who would be heartless enough to propose the excision of a word: —

"Roses that down the alleys shine afar,
And open jasmine-muffled lattices,
And groups under the dreaming garden-trees,
And the full moon and the white evening star."

That object in the landscape in which the poet takes the greatest interest as intimately connected with his memory of the dead, the —

"Lonely tree against the western sky," is the object which now and then seems to the reader a blot, — an inharmonious something interfering with the quiet beauty of the landscape. It looms like a phantom through the poem : —

"Backed by the sunset which doth glorify
The orange and pale violet evening sky."

Now it is called : —

"The lone sky-pointing tree."

Again : —

"That single elm-tree bright Against the west."

And always where it is thrown into the scene it suggests a weird loneliness, it conjures up a picture of the poet's great grief.

It will be seen that in speaking of this elegy we claim one of its chief merits (it has others, which will be hereinafter incidentally touched upon) to consist in the wonderful truth and beauty of its landscape. In turning to the second of our new elegies we shall have to deal with merit in an entirely different direction. No writer of our own time has dared so much in verse as Mr. Swinburne. Browning, it is true, has the most wonderful facility for dealing with the human heart, — with its motives, — with its most secret workings. His is a sort of mental vivisection. Swinburne attempts more. He follows the soul after its escape from earth. He would fain penetrate the impenetrable mysteries. And this indicates the chief point of difference between Thyrsis and Ave atque Vale. In the former the poet dwells among his memories. He finds in revisiting the old familiar paths solace, comfort, rest. Only once or twice does he timidly venture to follow "a long way off." But baffled, blinded, he returns as suddenly, and treads again the well-known fields. Swinburne, on the other hand, has no landscape of sunny memories in which to linger. He launches out after the soul of his friend. He gropes after the grand possibilities of his comrade's new existence. He revels among mysteries hidden behind the veil. The poem opens with one of those grand verses which will be set by after generations as one of the great facts of our literature : —

"Shall I strew on thee rose or rue or laurel,
Brother, on this that was the veil of thee?
Or quiet sea-flower moulded by the sea,
Or simplest growth of meadow-sweet or sorrel
Such as the summer-sleepy Dryads weave,
Waked up by snow-soft sudden rains at eve?
Or wilt thou rather, as on earth before,
Half-faded flowery blossoms, pale with heat
And full of bitter summers, but more sweet
To thee than gleanings of a northern shore
Trod by no tropic feet?"

The ineffable music, the exquisite rhythm of these lines cannot be over-praised. Coming upon them immediately after the calm and flawless verse of Arnold, one feels that it is turning from the poet of culture to the born poet. Arnold's elegy might have been written by one whose ability to write was founded on a loving and careful study of the accepted masters. Swinburne's verse is such as could only be uttered by a man with, what Carlyle, in his grand rough way, would call, the "divine gift of God" lodged in him.

Apostrophizing the dead, the poet proceeds to question him on the passage from life : —

"Is it not well where soul from body slips,
And flesh from bone divides without a pang,
As dew from flower-bell drips?"

Here it seems as though the poet felt that no audible answer from beyond the bourne is possible, and hastily changing his tone of inquiry, he strikes a higher and firmer note : —

"It is enough; the end and the beginning
Are one thing to thee who art past the end.
O hand unclasped of unbelohden friend,
For thee no fruits to pluck, no palms for winning,
No triumph, and no labor, and no lust,
Only dead yew leaves and a little dust.
O quiet eyes, wherein the light saith naught,
Whereto the day is dumb, nor any night,
With obscure finger silences your sight;
Nor in your speech the sudden soul speaks thought,
Sleep, and have sleep for light."

Then follow those lines in which the fancy is given freest rein. The departed brother is pictured as finding place "at the great knees and feet of some pale Titan-woman," — as reclining "under the shadow of her fair vast head," beside

"The solemn slope of mighty limbs asleep,
The weight of awful tresses that still keep
The savor and shade of old-world pine-forests,
Where the wet hill-winds weep."

In this place one might urge a very humble but very honest protest against the dicta of certain spouters of commonplace criticism, who object to poets giving expression to such fancies as those just quoted, on the ground that, in these times of telegraphs and sewing-machines, of stock exchanges and velocipedes, it is an insult to our common sense, to say nothing of our religious feelings, for any man to hold and utter such old-world blasphemies. We object, first of all, to the very prevalent habit of making poets responsible for a belief in every expression which they may happen to let fall, unless that expression is explicitly stated as an article of creed, and unless it be in accord with the tenor of the author's whole writings. We object, secondly, to a poet — or any artist whatever — being restricted as to what flowers of thought he is at liberty to cull. An eagle in Regent's Park is an ignoble-looking bird enough. There are critics among us who would act the part of the Royal Zoological Society, and cage our poets. These fancies of Mr. Swinburne's, we dare say, are with him no matters of settled belief. And, indeed, it is of no special interest to resolve the question as to whether they are or not. It is grand poetic thought. It is true artistic work. So far only should we be interested in it. Possibly enough there be those in Paternoster Row who affect a holy horror there anent. We have yet to learn that the verdict of Paternoster Row has ever been accepted as final on matters of art.

We must, however, let this over-long parenthesis determine.

Having permitted his song to fly after the "sweet strange elder singer," and having caught in the flight only

"Some dim derision of mysterious laughter
From the blind, tongueless warders of the dead,
Some gainless glimpse of Proserpine's veiled head," the poet is forced to mourn his inability to follow successfully the fled spirit. And he bewails it in lines altogether unforgettable : —

"Thou art far too far off for wings of words to follow,
Far too far off for thought or any prayer.
What ails us with thee who art wind and air?"

What ails us gazing where all seen is hollow?
Yet with some fancy, yet with some desire,
Dreams pursue death as winds a plying fire,
Our dreams pursue our dead and do not find.
Still, and more swift than they, the thin flame flies,
Her low light falls us in elusive skies,
Still the foiled earnest ear is deaf, and blind
Are still the eluded eyes."

In the stanzas following that quoted the poet pictures the Muses weeping, and the "God of all suns and songs" bending "to mix his laurel" with the dead poet's "cypress crown." Then the writer himself joins in the moving throng, or rather follows it. After the voice of the gods there comes the soft human strain, the first lines of it somewhat reminiscent of certain of Mr. Arnold's philosophies:—

"There is no help for these things; none to mend
And none to mar; not all our songs, O friend,
Will make death clear or make life durable.
Howbeit with rose and ivy and wild vine,
And with wild notes about this dust of thine,
At least I fill the place where white dreams dwell,
And wreath an unseen shrine."

The memorable music of Swinburne's Ave atque Vale ends in a strain worthy of its noble first notes:—

"For thee, O now a silent soul, my brother,
Take at my hands this garland and farewell.
Thin is the leaf and chill the wintry smell,
And chill the solemn earth a fatal mother,
With sadder than the Niobeian womb
And in the hollow of her breasts a tomb.
Content thee howsoever, whose days are done;
There lies not any troublous thing before,
Nor sight nor sound to war against thee more,
For whom all winds are quiet as the sun,
All waters as the shore."

In a crude, suggestive way we have endeavored to point out the beauties of our new elegies. We claim for Mr. Swinburne's the highest place, as approaching more nearly the standard of English elegy, as striking a loftier note, as pouring forth a wilder and grander music. Arnold's is the music of a harp played by the waters. Swinburne's the rush and wail of an organ struck on its keys by a master-hand. Both poems constitute so important an addition to our stock of elegies that no student of English literature can afford to slight or ignore them.

WILLIAM LIBRI.

THIS celebrated man of both science and letters died at Fiesole, near Florence, on the evening of Tuesday, September 28, after long and exhausting illness. We cannot pretend to give any sufficient account. He was born very soon after the beginning of the century, — we believe in 1803, — was of a very ancient family, and bore an ancient title. This he tried to drop, both in France and England, but without success. In vain was he Guillaume Libri and nothing else on his title-pages; his servants were determined to be the servants of a Count, and the directories were instructed accordingly. His early successes in mathematical research and in literary investigation, his political opposition to the Austrian Government, his flight into France, his cordial reception there, nomination to the Institute, and appointment to various scientific offices, bring him to the age of thirty, or thereabouts. While in France, he published the four volumes of his history of science in Italy. This work was not to the taste of his French hosts; it vindicated claims which the French writers had endeavored to refute or suppress.

At this time Libri was rich, both by his French appointments and his Italian patrimony. An ardent collector of books and manuscripts, he had got together such a library of Italian history as will hardly be seen again. He offered the whole collection, of which the Italian was the most prominent part, to the French nation, on condition of its being preserved together as the Libri Collection. The offer was refused; but M. Guizot remembers it well and gave evidence of it, which the framers of the subsequent indictment, or discussion called an indictment, found it convenient to suppress, when they represented the whole collection as stolen in the heart of Paris.

The boldness of his opposition and the force of his satire made him enemies; and he did not try to disarm hostility. It is a favorite practice in France to accuse book-collectors of stealing; and it seems as if the intrinsic probability of the charge is not small in that country; the book-stalls throughout Europe show evidences of extensive pillage of French collections. A secret Report was forwarded to M. Guizot a few days before the revolution of 1848, imputing, not merely small fraud, but extensive robbery.

When the revolution broke out, Libri was immediately threatened with popular vengeance on political grounds, and was advised to depart at once. He did so, and his flight was followed by the publication of the Report above mentioned, and much crowing. But Libri had managed to save documents which afforded a complete answer.

Then followed the long chain of persecution by seizure of his French books and effects, by indictment, by conviction par contumace, &c. The gems of this controversy are almost unmatched. One of the books named in the indictment laid against him had the Mazarine stamp upon it, but it had been standing in our King's Library at the British Museum for a century. Another was in its place in the Mazarine Library itself. Another had been bought by Molini in open market long before. As to knowledge, the French experts read S. Jo. (Sancti Johannis) as sancti decem. Our readers will find all this and more in old numbers of this journal, which was the first that opened its columns to Libri's defence. We need hardly repeat that those who attend to books, in every part of Europe, are satisfied not merely of Libri's entire innocence, but of the malicious absurdity of the charges.

His life in England was diversified by several splendid sales of his collections. He gradually sank into ill-health, and more than a year ago resolved to try the air of Switzerland and Italy. In the last twenty years of his life he did nothing for the history of science except the notes to the rarities of his sales.

We hold Libri to be the man who, for this century, has won the palm of double strength, who has shown the greatest joint force in literature and science. In truth, through the whole course of history we find none but Leibnitz who can be set up for discussion against him. This is a bold assertion to make at this early period; but we have formed our opinion very gradually, and are confident it will be finally accepted.

Libri had strong enemies and strong rivals; a man of his temperament was sure to have both. His great enemy was Arago; his great rival — at least, so the French Institute said — was Michel Chasles. He lived to see both removed below comparison. Arago, head of the French Observatory, gave out in lectures, year after year, and left for publication, that the sun causes all the precession and the moon all the nutation. Michel Chasles, just before Libri's death, informed the world that he has to prosecute a paltry forger for making him believe that Hannah Smith signed herself "Miss Anne Ascough Newton." We cannot allow the anagram which we gave to drop, — "Sign such a name, son! not we!"

If we had had a new gunpowder plot, it would have been circulated in France that Libri was the principal Guy Faux. He was charged with being the author of the Pascal forgeries. He it was who, almost bedridden, wrote and dictated (it was said) thousands of letters with no greater object than the mystification of an old opponent!

In old English romance, we know how greatly the prowess of the Saracens was respected by the accounts given, in deadly hate, of the size and forces of their champions. In like manner, we see that Libri was, to the French world of science, the "griff Soldan."

Libri was twice married. His first wife was a Frenchwoman of varied literary accomplishments, who showed her opinion of him by giving him her hand the moment the indictment appeared. His second, who survives, is a young English lady, who in regard and admiration for his character, and compassion for his lonely state, undertook the task of watching and smoothing his path to the grave.

OUR FRIENDS' FRIENDS.

It is a curious fact, but it is a fact, that, as a general rule, there are few people so disagreeable to us as our friends' friends. The merest stranger has a better chance of exciting a kindly interest in our breasts than the most valued friend of our dearest friend. We hardly acknowledge this to ourselves; still less would we permit our feelings to be known to the world. When some one who has been praised beforehand is introduced by a friend we answer, "Any friend of yours is welcome"; "I am delighted to make the acquaintance of one of whom I have heard so much"; or some polite phrase of this kind; but while we give utterance to the conventionalism we are conscious of a latent prejudice against the stranger. This feeling is not confined to individual friends; it extends to whole families. It influences women in a still stronger degree than it does men. Perhaps in the ordinary affairs of life, they are more unselfish than the other sex, but they are certainly more exacting and intolerant where the affections are concerned.

To this secret jealousy between friends, the author of Realmah, in a passing allusion to the subject, gives the name of claimative an addition to the language for which we are much indebted to him. It is felt more or less by the majority of mankind, but in some sensitive, diffident natures it is intensified to a painful degree. Men of a poetic temperament are more apt to suffer from this unhappy disposition than their more prosaic neighbors. An eminent writer has observed that in order to be successful and happy, it is necessary to want refinement to a certain extent, and no doubt it would conduce very much to our happiness if we were blind to small slights and snubs. Now claimative people are over-refined and sensitive; they are not only keenly alive to all intentional slights, but they imagine insults that are never meant, and not unfrequently suppose that they themselves have given offence when such is not the case; taxing themselves with some trifling omission, which probably nobody noticed but themselves.

Any one who possesses a claimative friend knows that he is not the pleasantest sort of acquaintance one could have, but for the sake of his good and noble qualities we bear with his crotchets. When you invite him to your house, he notes whether his reception is as cordial as usual, and whether you pay more attention to other guests. If he hears that you have confided in, or consulted any other friend, he feels hurt that he had not been first acquainted with the matter. If he passes you in a public assembly while you are conversing with any one, he thinks you saluted him coldly. If he sees you intimate with other people, he comes to the conclusion that these "new friends" must necessarily supersede him in your esteem. If you are dull or out of spirits in his company, he thinks you are vexed with him, and silence he interprets as sulkiness.

Your claimative friend is an exemplary correspondent, while you perhaps are not; and if, when from home for any length of time, you do not transmit an account of yourself to him regularly, he feels deeply wounded, and tells you reproachfully that the pursuit of money, ambition, or pleasure, would never induce him to forget an early friend. If he meets with any reverse of fortune he takes it for granted that his friends intend to drop his acquaintance; he carefully avoids meeting you, and, if it happens accidentally, he crosses to the other side of the street, and won't look in your direction till you catch him by the arm. These are the unpleasantnesses appertaining to a claimative friend; but they are outbalanced by his sterling qualities, — a high sense of honor, a scrupulous conscientiousness, generosity, sincerity, and a tender-heartedness almost womanly, that secures for him the forbearance which is extended towards the weaker sex; not because he is weak, but because it is the affectionateness of his nature which makes him so exacting.

These finely strung natures suffer; they sometimes weary us with their complaints, but they do not cry out half so often as they are hurt; and they do not feel the less keenly because their wounds are often self-inflicted. Gerald Griffin, himself a perfect type of the claimative man, refined, sensitive self-distrustful, warm-hearted, has well expressed the feelings of his class in the following verses: —

"My soul is sick and lone,
No social ties its love entwine;
A heart upon a desert thrown Beats not in solitude like mine.
For though the pleasant sunlight shine,
It shows no form that I may own;
And closed to me is friendship's shrine:
I am alone! I am alone!

"It is no joy for me
To mark the fond and eager meeting
Of friends whom absence pined, and see
The love-lit eyes speak forth their greeting;
For then a silly voice repeating
What oft hath woke its deepest moan,
Startles my heart and stays its beating:
I am alone! I am alone!

"I have a heart; — I'd live
And die for him whose worth I knew,
But could not clasp his hand and give
My full heart forth as talkers do.
And they who loved me — the kind few —
Believed me changed in heart and tone;
And left me, while it burned as true,
To live alone! To live alone!"

We do not all feel as keenly as this; but we have almost all been sufficiently "misunderstood" at times to make us sympathize with the heart-wounds of our too sensitive friends. But while we compassionate, we cannot but condemn a habit of mind so destructive to the happiness of its owner. Instead of recognizing it as a fault of character, and trying to check his jealous tendencies, the claimative man plumes himself on his proud reserve and his quickness to take offence. The stag would not barter his beauty, his grace, his fleetness, for the thick impenetrable skin of the rhinoceros, which no weapon can wound; so he hugs and cherishes his delicate sensibility till it grows into a grave fault. Underneath his bashful reserve there is a latent vanity, a consciousness of unrecognized merit, mingling with a want of confidence in his own power of commanding respect. It is not modesty but pride which keeps him from putting himself forward and claiming his proper position. If you do not recognize his worth, it is not for him to make it known to you; he will not condescend to compete with rivals whom he holds in contempt; if you could think him capable of such and such, it would be hardly worth his while to explain the matter; if you could have so misinterpreted his actions, how could he ever hope to be properly understood by you? And so he wraps his soul in such a mantle of reserve that his friends

"Believe him changed in heart and tone,
And leave him, while it burns as true,
To live alone! To live alone!"

He believes himself to be "misunderstood" by everybody; and so he is to a certain extent; but it is chiefly the fault of his own reticence; and moreover he misunderstands others quite as often as they do him.

In reality the claimative character only experiences in an exaggerated degree a feeling common to all mankind. It is, doubtless, a proof of the innate selfishness of the human heart, that we do not like any one to occupy so high a place in our friends' esteem or affection as we do. Jealousy is a species of selfishness which, though not so gross as other phases of the disorder, is more insidious, because it cloaks itself under the name of love. Even in its mildest form it ought to be guarded against. We ought to try to like our friends' friends for their sakes, and take it for granted that they know who know them longest are best able to estimate their worth. It would contribute very much to kind feeling, if we could extend to social intercourse some of the toleration which we are beginning to experience in politics and religion, and endeavor in all the relations of life to regard our friends' friends as ours also.

FOREIGN NOTES.

LONDON is at present suffering grievously from the scarlet fever.

MR. FECHTER is, it is stated, to leave for the United States in December.

DUTTON COOKE, the novelist, is the dramatic critic of the Pall Mall Gazette.

THE London Morning Star has shot from its sphere, and disappeared from the public view.

M. JULES SIMON has been lecturing at Bordeaux for the benefit of sufferers by the late disastrous fire.

THE real author of the Junius Letters is discovered once every five years with commendable regularity.

AN appropriate tomb to the memory of Samuel Lover, the poet, has been placed in the Kensal Green Cemetery. The tomb is of pure white Carrara marble, and on the top is a shadow cross, after the celebrated one at Bonchurch, Isle of Wight.

LONDON theatrical gossip says that Formosa has already cleared about £10,000, for Mr. Boucicault and Mr. Chatterton.

THE death is announced of the sculptor Pierre Hébert, author of the well-known group of the Child and the Tortoise.

THE Countess Guiccioli is now engaged in writing a memoir of her husband, the late Marquis de Boissy — poor man!

A NEW play by Mr. Halliday founded on "David Copperfield" is meeting with great success at the Olympic Theatre, London. Mr. Halliday calls his drama "Little Em'ly."

THE last number of the North British Review contains a very careful critical paper on Browning's new poem, "The Ring and the Book." The Diaries of Henry Crabb Robinson meet with an appreciative examination in the Edinburgh Review.

M. LOUIS LACAZE, a well-known amateur and collector of paintings has just died in Paris, and has left his gallery of pictures to the Louvre, on condition that they should be placed together in a room, to be named after him. The collection is valued at two millions of francs.

ORDERS have been given that the new opera-house in Paris is to be completed and opened on the 15th of August, 1870. The scaffolding is now being erected on the summit of the building for the erection of the bronze Pegasus, which has lately been exhibited in front of the palace in the Champs Elysées.

THE London Times tells this rather severe story about the British navy: "When the French iron-clad fleet visited Spithead, and the Admiral in command of our Channel Fleet signalled for all officers who could speak French to come on board the flagship and accompany the pilots to the French vessels, only one officer out of the entire fleet came forward in answer to the summons."

M. AUBER thinks it injudicious to remind the Fates of his age, lest Atropos should remember how long she has neglected her business. The other day M. Carafa, a composer well known in Paris, who is eighty-two years old, celebrated his birthday, and asked Auber to the gathering. The aged maestro declined in the following terms: "I think it savors too much of irony towards Providence to let the birthday of an old man of eighty-two be celebrated by an old man of eighty-six."

MADAME ERNST, for whose benefit a chair of poetry has just been created by special decree in the Sorbonne, is described as a young widow of thirty-five, with a stately and graceful bearing, a glance that would seem almost masculine, if it were not tempered by an expression of melancholy, and a strong, sonorous, and singularly flexible voice, as melodious as a harp, and quite equal to the requirements of the lecture-room. Her husband was the composer and violinist, Ernst. He died in 1865, after a happy union of ten years. The desire of perpetuating his memory lent inspiration to his widow; she became a sculptor by instinct, and herself modelled his tomb. Her subsequent lectures on French poetry attracted the attention of all Paris, and opened to her the gates of that ancient institution, the Sorbonne. Before her marriage she had acted with Rachel, and for two years had been the leading tragedienne at the Odéon.

It is asserted by the Mechanic's Magazine that one hour after the gas of London is lighted the air is de-oxygenized as much as if 500,000 people had been added to its population. During the combustion of oil, tallow, gas, &c., water is produced as well as carbonic acid; in cold weather we see it condensed on the windows. By the burning of gas twenty-four hours in London more water, it is estimated, is produced than would supply an emigrant ship on her voyage from England to Australia.

Not very long since, the first King of Siam received the present of a Highland dress complete. After a diligent and thoughtful study of their shape and materials, the monarch believed himself to comprehend the use of these strange garments, and, in great contentment, summoned the court tailor. This official received instructions to prepare forthwith three hundred copies of the model, made to measure of the three hundred royal wives, who, for several months afterwards, invariably attended on their husband in the "garb of old Gaul."

A MAGIC concert has been recently given in Paris. The audience assembled in a drawing-room, and on a platform was placed a piano, violin, violoncello, and harp, but no performers. At a given signal the overture to "William Tell" was heard issuing from the orchestra. Unlike the so-called spiritual manifestations, the affair took place in broad daylight. The effect was produced by artists in another room playing on identical instruments connected by means of bars of wood with the instruments in the orchestra. The vibrations were carried through these rods (which were enclosed by non-conductors), sympathy causing the instruments to sound together. This curious effect was first shown at the Royal Institution of London, by Sir W. Wheatstone.

THE Elberfeld Gazette remarks that, though Count Bismarck is ready enough to impose new taxes on the people, he is very reluctant to pay taxes himself. His income, it adds, is composed of 4,000 thalers as Minister for Lauenburg, 12,000 thalers as President of the Prussian Cabinet, 6,000 thalers table money, and a free residence; and if we add to this the interest on the gratuity of 400,000 thalers which he received at Christmas, 1867, his warmest friends need not be anxious about his expenditure. Yet, proceeds the Gazette, Count Bismarck has addressed a long petition to the revenue department, in which he not only appeals against being charged income tax on more than one half of his official income, but asks that 15 thalers which he paid during the year for receipt stamps may be exempted from the tax.

SIDNEY DOBELL, who was recently injured by an unruly mare, does not wish the accident attributed to his want of horsemanship. "A king of France," he says, in a note to a London paper, "is not half a king of France if he cannot ride. A poet may, however, be a poet without being a horseman. But when he is both, there is an equestrian pride about him which an old Roman might have approved and a modern Briton will not censure. As you have done me the honor to mention my late accident, perhaps you will excuse the vanity of one who has been accustomed from childhood to the saddle, if I offer an explanatory remark. The injuries from which I am now recovering were not due to my fall, but to the weight of the mare upon me. She had been vainly endeavoring to give me a fall, and threw herself over because she could not succeed. We did not part company till close to the ground."

THE Moscow Gazette publishes a curious letter from Constantinople on the subject of the Holy Places. Some years ago, says the correspondent, Russia, France, and Turkey agreed to restore the cupola of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. After the work had been duly completed and inspected by the representatives of the three Powers, the keys of the entrance to the upper gallery, which had been in the possession of the French architect, were given up to the Greek patriarch, in the presence of the Russian consul and the Turkish governor. The Greek patriarch is regarded by the Turks as the lawful possessor of these keys, but the Roman Catholic clergy deny his claim to them, and have loudly expressed their dissatisfaction at the conduct of the Turkish authorities. It is to be hoped, however, adds the Russian paper, "that the interests of the Greek clergy will be secured in this matter as well as in that of the restoration of the curtain which was damaged in the fire which lately took place in the cave of Bethlehem."

It is announced that a novelty will shortly appear in London in the shape of "Mdm Natator, the lady frog, who will perform some remarkable feats in an aquarium." "We have seen such remarkable feats performed by ladies out of aquariums," says the Pall Mall Gazette, "that it will indeed be a gratifying novelty to see them inside a tank, and nothing they can do there is likely to surprise us; indeed, if the feats to be performed in any way resemble some of the recent exhibitions, an aquarium well hidden with weeds will be a very proper arena for the exhibition. We learn also from the Musical Standard that the ballet-master of a French theatre is 'training a monstrous snake to take part in a ballet, the scene of which is laid in the Garden of Eden.' The Musical Standard is inclined to discredit the statement; but we think that nothing can be more natural on the stage, as at present conducted, than to see Adam and Eve pirouetting out of Paradise and dancing a pas de deux in the presence of the cherubim with the flaming sword. We fear, however, that the serpent will find the fall of man has gone rather farther than he intended. It will be necessary to instruct the corps de ballet that in the Scriptural account the absence of clothing preceded instead of following the fall."

It is now known that Denis Vrain Lucas is the name of the palæontologic archivist who furnished M. Chasles with the forged documents which that gentleman presented to the Academy of Sciences in support of his assertion that Pascal was the real discoverer of the law of gravitation. Lucas, a little olive-complexioned man, was born in 1816 at Laneray, and commenced life as a servant; he then became a copying clerk, and was afterwards engaged at Châteaudun in a mortgage office, where he acquired a taste for old parchments. He afterwards came to Paris, and had a hard time of it till he fell in with M. Chasles, whose bounty enabled him to breakfast at the Café Riche; he passed his afternoons in the Imperial Library, studying the fifteen volumes left by Galileo, and in the evening he prepared documents for his patron at the house of a petite dame. When Lucas was arrested he was drawing up an authentic memoir to prove that the velocipede was an invention of the reign of Louis XIV., and there is no knowing into what a slough of absurdity this quondam domestic might not have dragged his credulous savant but for the Academy of Florence. No similar abuse of confidence has been known in Paris since a rich collector was persuaded to purchase an obelisk nearly as large as that in the Place de la Concorde, which turned out to be made of pasteboard. M. Chasles is still loath to think himself entirely deceived.

THE Inverness Courier, in noticing the announcement of an autobiography of this celebrated lady, preserver of Prince Charles, which has been carefully preserved in the family record-chest, and is now preparing for publication by Mr. Nimmo, of Edinburgh, observes: "That none of our Scottish historians or topographers, who explored so minutely the wanderings and vicissitudes of Charles Edward, seem to have been aware of the existence of the above manuscript. Flora—or Flory, as she signed her name in her marriage contract—had a singular and romantic career, and if she recorded fully her own trials and the state of the Highlands in the middle of last century, her autobiography cannot fail to possess interest. She was in her twenty-fourth year when she gallantly risked her own freedom to preserve that of Prince Charles. By the Jacobites of that day she was idolized. A private subscription was opened for her, which soon amounted to £1,500, and she sat to Allan Ramsay for her portrait, still preserved in Oxford. The features are decidedly Celtic, the complexion dark, contrasting with the ample white rose that decorates the bust. Boswell and Johnson describe her in 1773 as a little woman of genteel appearance and pleasing address.

When she returned, the heroine of the day to the Highlands, her society was courted by all classes, and between three and four years afterwards she gave her hand to young Kingsburgh, who was the model of a Highlander in countenance, figure, dress, and speech. Affairs do not seem to have gone prosperously with them, and in 1774 Flora and her husband emigrated to North Carolina. When the war broke out Kingsburgh joined the Royalist forces, was taken prisoner, but regained his liberty, and served with the 84th in Canada. They returned, and it is related that the vessel in which Flora and her husband sailed was attacked by a French privateer, and while the Celtic heroine stood on deck bravely animating the seamen, she was thrown down and one of her arms broken. She was destined, however, to die at home at last, departing in her sixty-eighth year, in 1790, and her shroud being formed of part of the sheets in which Prince Charles slept at Kingsburgh. Here are materials for romantic biography! The hair-breadth escapes of the royal wanderer,—the state of the Highlands while society yet retained some of the picturesque features of clanship,—the emigrant voyage across the Atlantic and the subsequent American war,—the perilous return to Britain,—and the final ten years of peace while all was changing in the Highlands and Islands, and the old race was disappearing from the land,—such are the striking events in the life of Flora Macdonald.

THE Cologne Gazette publishes some further particulars of the murder of Miss Tinné, the traveller. It says that it appears from a letter from Herr Rossi, the Austrian Consul at Tripoli, that the unfortunate lady was the victim of a dispute between two tribes of the Tuaregg race. On arriving at Mursuk she obtained an escort from Ichnuchen, the most powerful chief of this tribe, to take her to their camp, where she purposed to spend the summer. Unfortunately the escort consisted of Ichnuchen's enemies, who determined to revenge themselves upon him by murdering his protégée. Miss Tinné, of course, knew nothing of this, and went with them in full confidence, though she was warned by the Turkish governor of Mursuk that there were dissensions among the Tuareggs. Two Dutchmen, a sailor, and a boy, who were the only Europeans in her escort, were all murdered at the same time as herself. According to another version, also published in the Cologne Gazette which is given in a letter to the African traveller Rohlf from Mr. Chapman, the British vice-consul at Bengazi, Miss Tinné was murdered by her escort because she was an obstacle to a plundering expedition which they wished to make in the land of the Jiraffi tribe. The brother of the chief of the escort had been murdered by this tribe, and they accordingly proposed, instead of going to their camp direct, to make a long detour by way of Bilma, where they intended to attack the Jiraffis. To this Miss Tinné objected, and they then determined to put her out of the way. Mr. Chapman thus describes the murder:—

"A dispute occurred between the camel drivers, and the two Dutchmen in Miss Tinné's suite went off to the spot to restore order, leaving the lady standing in front of her tent surrounded by the Tuaregg chiefs. Meanwhile the dispute grew warmer, and Miss Tinné advanced a few steps to be able to see it more closely. The chief who stood behind her took this opportunity of striking her down with his broadsword. She gave a loud shriek and sank inanimate to the ground. Hearing the screams of their mistress, the Dutchmen ran to the tent, but were cut down before they could get their arms. The murderers then broke open the metal jars with which the camels were loaded, thinking that they must be full of gold or silver, and were much disappointed on finding that they contained nothing but water. . . . There were from fifty to seventy negroes in Miss Tinné's suite, but they were not all made slaves, only the youngest and best-looking. Among these was a little negress of the Niam-Niam tribe named Ismina, who was a great favorite with Miss Tinné. The remaining negroes returned to Mursuk with the news."

CHARLES AUGUSTIN SAINTE-BEUVE was born at Boulogne-sur-Mer in December, 1804. His father, who is supposed to have belonged to an old Jansenist family, was a "contrôleur principal des droits réunis"; his mother was an Englishwoman, of a religious turn, who made him familiar at an early age with the works of the eminent modern poets of her own language. By his proficiency in classical studies he distinguished himself at the colleges Charlemagne and Bourbon, and his Latin compositions in prose and verse gained for him a high reputation. He was at first destined for the medical profession, but he soon devoted himself to literature, and his earliest contributions were to Le Globe, of which M. Dubois, formerly his professor of rhetoric, was chief editor. The war between the classic and romantic schools was then at its height, and Sainte-Beuve showed his zeal as a partisan of the former by an attack on the "Odes and Ballads" of Victor Hugo. The poet, however, took care to convert an enemy into a friend, and invited Sainte-Beuve to the réunions at his house in the Rue Notre Dame des Champs, when he became one of the click headed by his host, De Vigny, Albert de Musset, the two Deschamps, and others. The works written by Sainte-Beuve under this influence were the "Tableau de la Littérature Française au Seizième Siècle," and the "Poésies de Joseph Delorme," which he gave as the posthumous compositions of a medical student, dead through a pulmonary complaint. Other emanations belonging to the same period were "Les Consolations," and, somewhat later, "Les Pensées d'Août." A private difference with M. Hugo broke the connection between them, and to this is attributed the appearance of Sainte-Beuve as an iconoclast of his former idols. The change occasioned an article in the Figaro by Alphonse Karr, entitled "L'Affreux Bonhomme," in which Sainte-Beuve was not indeed mentioned by name, but so described that the object of the satire could not be mistaken. His literary career was continued in the Revue de Paris and the Revue des Deux Mondes; and in 1830 he became connected with the National, and attached himself to Lamennais, under whose influence, it is supposed, he wrote his novel "Volupté," the subject of which is the war of the flesh with the spirit. His predilection for the Jansenism of his family was shown by his "Histoire de Port-Royal," which had originally appeared as a series of lectures to the citizens of Lausanne. Of the "Causeries de Lundi," by which his name is best known in this country, there are two series, one extending from 1851 to 1857 the other from 1863 to 1869.

The political tergiversation of his later days rendered Sainte-Beuve extremely unpopular with the Liberal party, and an uproar which took place in 1853, when at the Collège de France he inaugurated the course of Latin poetry, is remembered among the notabilia of that day. Not only did the students produce every sound of which the human lungs are capable, but benches were torn up and doors wrenched from their hinges; and the professor, who had come to discourse on Virgil, was forced to retreat unheard. He afterwards derived consolation from the grant of two Government offices. As a literary laborer he has died in harness, having written for Le Temps nearly to the close of his life. His important work on Proudhon is left unfinished.

THE Pall Mall Gazette asks if it is not a sign of the times that a fashion has set in for the most sumptuous and elaborate wax-dolls? Little ladies, following the instinct which made them nurse their toys long ago, used to be content with a very simple and candid effigy indeed. The toilet of the doll then was generally left to the taste of the owner; and it was supposed in itself to be a sort of liberal education in the fine art of millinery to devise garments for the figure which, from the neck downwards, was composed of honest cotton stuffed with sawdust. But the doll, like the legitimate drama and some other things, has sadly declined from primiitive simplicity. She has now become a grand demoiselle with a chignon, high-heeled, brass-tipped boots, and an eyeglass. She is endowed with parts of speech. On being squeezed round the waist she raises her eyeglass in the correct mode and barks; the organ of language inside her girdle being as yet imperfectly developed. A gentle pressure which may be surreptitiously exercised in the palm of her hand causes her to arch her eyebrows in the most natural way in the world. She has not to put up with the makeshift limbs peculiar to the species. She is real wax from head to foot, and is as anatomical as an ordinary statuette. The doll artist does not stop here. He has gone further and devised handsome young gentlemen for the young ladies to play with. Perfect ducks of boys with knickerbockers and curly wigs and red lips, sailors, highlanders, and the like, are displayed for choice, and are desired almost as much as the female poppets. Then, again, we have whole babies of full size, and of a most disconcerting resemblance to life, constructed for the amusement of the young. In one shop may be seen a round dozen of infants quite equal to anything that Madame Tussaud's connections could turn out, and infants of a plump quality put forward in a manner horribly suggestive to an imaginative mind of the sort of eating wigwam or dining house that might exist among cannibal Indians. By means of a simple piece of string these children can be made to cry and move their legs and arms, while the appropriate bassinet can also be purchased on the premises. The Saturday Review should look to this. An early familiarity with French mannikins (the male dolls are, we believe, imported from Paris) must tend to give an unwholesome impulse to the craving of the sex for flirtation. Is it good for our children to familiarize them with the garnishing and the fixed airs of the fast girl? A deal of neat satire might be made out of these points, but seriously it is a pity to mark the decay of simpletonianism, even in the fashion of dolls. The notion of making them large and elaborate is monstrous and ghastly, there being nothing on this side the grave more unpleasant than the dead-alive gape, stare, and hue of the lumpish simulacra of a wax show. The confidences of a child with dolly must be broken and spoiled completely when the plaything either frightens or imposes upon the child's fancy. The mannikin and the Brobdignagian infant ought to be banished from the toy shops altogether. The former is to be detested not only upon social grounds, but on the grounds of expense, and for having to a certain extent put our ancient friend Jack-in-the-box out of countenance. What between the superb dolls of both sexes, Siamese links, chemical serpents, and the rest of it, Jack's place knows him no more, and this is to be regretted. The element of surprise, the one trick which Jack had in him, would be of more recreative service to small folk than the modish marionettes or the ingenious snakes and "sells" which tend to make their patrons wise or foolish before their time; but we are afraid we plead in vain for Jack and for the doll of rags and bran. Noah's ark itself has fallen into contempt with most young people. We can remember when this ark, with its contents (including Japhet), was taken for granted as a thing for belief and enjoyment by children generally: now there is almost a taint of Biblical criticism, or what resembles it, born with the rising generation, and nothing will do for them but microscopes and dolls that are humaner with a certain ironical truth.

[No. 203.]

TWENTY-ONE MONTHS OF SILENCE.

It happened on a summer evening, now something more than two years ago, that the surgeon of a certain regiment of high standing then quartered at Chatham, was engaged in his surgery in making some experiments of a chemical sort, when one of the men belonging to the regiment came to the door and desired to have speech with him. This man was a private, John Strong by name, lately enlisted, and not remarkable hitherto as having in any way shown himself to be different from the rest of the rank and file of the corps. He had come to the doctor, he said, to complain of the state of his health. He felt so "queer" all over, as he described it; could not settle down to any occupation; was cold and hot by turns; had pains all over his body and limbs, and was altogether very much "out of sorts." After hearing all this, and after having recourse to the usual pulse-feeling, and tongue-inspecting formula, the doctor wrote the man an order for admission to the infirmary, and, telling him to go to bed immediately, promised to visit him when he made his usual rounds the first thing next morning.

True to his promise, at an early hour on the following day the regimental surgeon, whom we will call Dr. Curzon, went to the infirmary, and made his way to the bedside of the new patient, expecting to find him suffering from some slight feverish attack, or some other trifling ailment, which a day or two's quiet, and a dose of medicine, would quickly set right. The aspect of the invalid, as the surgeon approached the bed, was even more encouraging than he had expected, and Dr. Curzon was on the point of giving him his views on the subject of false alarms when, happening to look more attentively at the patient than he had done before, he observed that Private Strong was gesticulating in a very extraordinary manner, and especially twisting his mouth and jaws into a variety of strange and unearthly contortions, as if in an ineffectual attempt to utter some articulate sounds, which would not come forth. On examining him yet more attentively, the doctor observed that a sheet of paper was lying on his breast, on which was written the following inscription: "I HAVE HAD A FIT IN THE NIGHT, AND HAVE LOST THE POWER OF SPEAKING."

Dr. Curzon had been an army-surgeon for many a long year, and had come in contact with numberless instances of deceit and shamming, practised by soldiers with the view of obtaining a discharge. He remembered how some of them had, to his own certain knowledge, assumed to be mad or idiotic; how others had scratched raw places on their limbs, and bound over them penny-pieces (in the days of the old copper coinage) or even rubbed them with phosphorus got from lucifer matches, in order to make such abrasions resemble sores of a dangerous and incurable sort. Then, besides, there are books written on this subject full of the most wonderful examples of feigning in the matter of disease, such simulation being sometimes engaged in with a view to some special object, and sometimes (but this almost invariably by women) with the desire of attracting attention and winning a kind of renown. Among men this simulating of disease — malingering it is called in military phrase — is resorted to with a specific intention. "The sufferings imposed by malingers on themselves," says Gavin on Feigned Diseases, "are infinitely greater than any punishment a commanding officer would dare to inflict; thus a soldier for a period of eighteen months walked with his body bent forward so that his arms reached within two inches of the ground." In another a discharge "was so eagerly coveted that a man had his arm shot through to obtain it"; while in another place, when treating of the extreme difficulty of getting hold of any evidence by means of which the malingering may be criminated, he expresses shrewdly enough his opinion that "there is a kind of Freemasonry among soldiers which is perhaps conducive to the harmony of the barrack-room, but which by preventing the exemplary from exposing the worthless, and by holding up the informer as an object of universal abhorrence, renders it extremely difficult to obtain an accurate knowledge of the various means of simulating disease." Another medical authority proclaims that he has "no doubt that methods have been systematized for simulating disease, and that these are preserved in many regiments and handed over for the benefit of those who may be inclined to make a trial of them."

Dr. Curzon questioned the other occupants of the infirmary, and especially those who slept in the beds which stood one on each side of that occupied by Private Strong, as to whether they had seen or heard anything of this seizure or fit, by which the dumb man professed to have been attacked in the night. Not one of them knew anything about it, and it was evident that if the man had ever really been the victim of such a seizure, he had taken it very quietly, and had not thought it necessary to disturb his companions; which, even supposing dumbness to have been one of the first symptoms of his attack, he might easily have done, the very fact of his having inscribed the particulars of his case upon the paper which the doctor found lying on his breast proving that he was certainly in possession of all his other faculties.

Dr. Curzon proceeded next to subject the patient himself to a very searching examination. He addressed several questions to him — for the man did not profess to be deaf as well as dumb — and bade him try at least to utter some kind of sound, more or less articulate, in answer; but beyond several extravagant distortions of the features generally, and much ineffectual opening and shutting of the mouth particularly, no response whatever was to be obtained. Next the doctor set himself to ascertain whether there was — as might certainly have been expected — any loss of power in connection with any other of the faculties. No such thing. The man was in all other respects perfectly healthy and vigorous, and not only was so, but looked so. Lastly, Dr. Curzon proceeded to engage in a prolonged scrutiny of the man's vocal chords, using an instrument made expressly for the purpose of such examinations, by means of which the interior of the throat is exposed to the view of the investigator. This proceeding, however, was productive of as little result as the rest. Mr. Strong's vocal chords were, as far as external appearance went, in much the same condition as those of other people. The examination over, Dr. Curzon left his patient for a time, entertaining a pretty firm conviction that this was simply a bad case of shamming, and leaving directions with all those who were likely to come in contact with the dumb man to keep a sharp look-out.

Days succeeded days, and the lips of John Strong remained — as far as the utterance of any articulate sound went — hermetically sealed. Not one of those about him could betray him into speech, nor was he ever heard to mutter any word, or intelligible sound in his sleep. Experiments of all kinds, in which the body and the mind were alike addressed were tried. The doctor — a man of great resource and much ingenuity — would, for instance, wake the man suddenly, in the middle of the night, and make him get out of bed to attend patients who needed assistance, addressing him, at that moment of sudden waking up, with some words which required an answer. Mr. Strong was, however, proof against these sudden surprises, and was quite himself even when thus abruptly roused in the middle of the night. Not a word was to be got out of him. Plenty of gesticulation, abundant evidence of attention, and of a clear comprehension of what was required of him; but no speech.

It was probable, the doctor thought, that if the man could for a time be deprived of consciousness, he would in that condition be brought to say something more or less intelligible. He determined to get the dumb man under the influence of chloroform, and try what could be done with him then. The chloroform was applied accordingly; but the man, by resisting, first, its application at all, and then its influence when they did succeed in applying it, managed to defeat the doctor's efforts in this line, the doctor hesitating to incur the risk of administering by main force a dose strong enough to render his patient incapable of all resistance. An attempt was then made to intoxicate him, and, as he refused to take a sufficient amount of spirit to bring about the desired end, a considerable dose of alcohol was cunningly introduced into the medicine he was in the habit of taking; but he steadily refused come what might, to swallow a single drop of the medicine so craftily qualified.

The doctor's wife had at this time in her employment a young woman, serving in the capacity of housemaid, who, besides being gifted with considerable personal attractions, was also endowed with a large share of that capacity for mischief, the possession of which persons of a misanthropic turn of mind are fond of ascribing to all members of the sex which doubles our joys and divides our sorrows. Having confided to this young person the particulars of Mr. Strong's case, the astute doctor, a little more than hinting that he looked upon the whole thing in the light of a "do," requested her as a last resource to come to the rescue. On a certain fine hot afternoon in July, the patient was sent up to Dr. Curzon's house, ostensibly to do some work in the doctor's garden, but really to encounter the fascinations of the doctor's housemaid. During the whole of that afternoon the full force of those fascinations was freely exercised upon him, whatever he did, and wherever he went. Did he set himself to the accomplishment of his allotted task in the garden, there was this dangerous young person ready to help him with his work, and even to do that work for him. Did he, on the other hand, sit down to rest himself in the shade, there she was, sitting beside him and conversationally disposed. She plied him with draughts of beer when he was thirsty, and later in the evening made him comfortable with tea and buttered toast. Strong drank the beer and ate the toast, nay, he smiled upon her gratefully, and expressed his contentment by the gesticulations which had by this time become familiar to him. All these things he did, but speak, or utter sound, he did not.

Yet there was no sort of colloquial snare which she did not lay for her companion; sometimes appealing to him for directions when they were at work together, and this in the most artless manner, as if she had forgotten the existence of that infirmity of his: at other times adopting a different line, and making open allusion to it, frankly telling him that she did not believe in its genuineness, and urging him to admit to her in confidence that it was all a sham.

Then she would be angry with him for his obstinacy, and rate him soundly or perhaps have recourse to ridicule and laugh at him in the most aggravating manner possible. But Private Strong was proof against it all. He was deaf to her entreaties, he smiled at her irritation, he joined in the laugh against herself when she was sarcastic. Finally he retired triumphant from the encounter, having passed a very pleasant afternoon, having eaten and drunk many good things, and leaving the question of the real or fictitious nature of his infirmity exactly where it had been when he set out in the morning to spend the day in Dr. Curzon's flower-garden.

The dumb man's statement now began to be believed by many who had before treated it with contempt. But the handmaiden maintained stoutly her conviction that Private Strong was certainly shamming, and was no more dumb than she was.

It was soon after the failure of this experiment, and about four months subsequent to the time of Strong's first attack, that the writer of this brief abstract, happening to be in the neighborhood of Chatham, first heard the outline of the dumb man's story. It was soon arranged that on a particular day, which suited the convenience of all concerned, he should go over to the depot, and pay a visit to this singular person, in company with a certain military officer and the regimental surgeon, Dr. Curzon.

This last-named gentleman, as we walked along in the direction of the place where the speechless soldier was at work, took the opportunity of relating some circumstances worthy of recapitulation here. It appeared that in the very regiment in which Dr. Curzon held his appointment there had lately occurred a case indicating such power of sustaining a deception possessed by one of the ordinary rank and file, as might well serve to make any regimental surgeon suspicious of the men under his charge. In this instance the assumed disease had been a combination of rheumatism and paralysis affecting the head and one of the arms. The head was completely forced out of its natural position, and bowed over to one side; the shoulder on the same side being raised to the ear, and the arm fixed in a bent position against the body. Of course such an affliction was fatal to everything in the shape of drill, and to the performance of any military duty; accordingly all sorts of remedies were applied with a view of curing this unfortunate recruit of his distortion, and getting his head and arm back into their natural condition. Some of these remedies were sufficiently painful. Experiments were made with red-hot irons, and others in which certain forms of acupuncture were resorted to. The unfortunate cripple endured all without flinching, but not one of them seemed to make the slightest impression on his malady. The obstinacy and peculiarity of the case had awakened some suspicion in the medical authorities, and he had been watched by night as well as by day. Not to the slightest purpose, the man retaining in his sleep as in his waking hours that same distorted position, with the head forced over on one side, and the arm fixed tightly against the body.

There is no doubt that this fact—which, if to be accounted for at all, can only be explained by supposing some power of exercising the will to be retainable by some men even in their sleep—had its influence in disarming the suspicion of those with whom the power of granting discharges rested. At all events, a medical board meeting was held, evidence was adduced to show that night and day this unfortunate cripple was never seen in any other position than in this distorted one, that all remedial applications were inefficacious, and that, the recruit being utterly useless and unfit for service, there was nothing for it but to discharge him. Discharged he was accordingly. A fortnight afterwards Dr. Curzon met him in the street walking along with his head erect and his arms swinging at his sides like other people. Indeed, the man actually had the audacity to address the doctor, and to congratulate him on the success of his medical treatment of the case; remarking that he was perfectly cured now, and very much obliged to the authorities for his discharge, as it had enabled him to take a very good situation in the town.

The doctor added, in reference to the present case, that he had resolved to utilize the man as he best could, and had accordingly sent him to the tailors' shop, where his dumbness would not stand in his way, and where his previous habits—for he had been bred a tailor—would be favorable to his making himself useful. By means of this arrangement, the necessity of taking immediate action in the difficult matter was obviated, and time gained in which to test him further. As the doctor concluded, we arrived at the door of the building appropriated to the regimental tailoring department, and went in.

Half a dozen soldiers were sitting on a raised tailors' board in the well-known professional attitude. They all raised their heads when we entered, except one, who, seated nearly with his back to the door, just turned his head and his eyes for a moment slightly, in our direction, and then went on with his sewing. A moment afterwards, on the name of "Strong" being called out by the doctor, this same person sprang off the board with quite a curious display of activity, and stood confronting us, with his hands close down by his sides, his stocking feet so close together that the great toes touched each other, and his eyes staring very intently straight before him at the doctor. This gentleman then proceeded to ask him some questions, as, indeed, we all did,—how he felt, whether there was any change in his condition, what was the state of his general health, and the like. He answered by gesticulation, always of a very energetic kind, and sometimes by means of the deaf and dumb alphabet on his fingers. He told us in this way, I remember, among other things, that he came from Wales, and that he was the first of his family who had ever been afflicted in this extraordinary manner. "Come," said the doctor at last, "let us see you make an effort to speak. Try to say, 'How d'ye do?'" The man certainly seemed to respond to this appeal, and nothing could be more energetic than the violent chopping action of the jaws with which he did so; but no word, nor, indeed, any sound whatever, was uttered. After this, we all stood staring rather helplessly, and in a state of mystification at each other. The soldiers sitting on the board, with their legs doubled under them, stared too.

The scene was brought to a close by the doctor. "Well," he said, "you are very comfortable here and usefully employed. You know we could n't possibly send you out and throw you upon your own resources, in the state in which you are at present, so you ought to think yourself very lucky." This was said, as the doctor told me afterwards, to show the man that he had nothing to hope in the way of getting his discharge. He appeared well pleased with what he heard, nodded and smiled briskly, and jumped up on his board again.

"He is so extraordinarily sharp and quick of hearing," whispered the doctor, as we left the building, "that I must ask you not to speak about him till we are well out of ear-shot." I had little to say, however. My impression was simply of a good-looking young fellow of a light and active build, with exceedingly bright eyes, having perhaps something a little mad about them. There was nothing stupid or brutal in his appearance; on the contrary, he looked brisk and lively, as well as exceedingly cunning. He certainly gave one the idea of a man possessed of much dogged determination, and quite capable of carrying out any scheme of an underhand nature which he might set before himself as a thing to be accomplished.

What private John Strong did set before himself as a thing to be accomplished, he did in this case most distinctly and completely succeed in doing. He carried his point. He was too much for the authorities. His powers were concentrated; theirs were diffused. He had but one thing to think of; they had many. For such work as mounting guard, with its necessary interchange of sign and counter-sign, as well as for all other forms of military duty of which speech is an essential part, this man was unfitted, as well as for the transmission of verbal messages, or spoken instructions; and so it came about at last that on a certain day Private John Strong was brought before the medical board, and after passing through another examination, and being subjected to a variety of final tests, was declared to be unfit for service, and was, then and there, formally discharged.

Soon afterwards, I found myself once more in the neighborhood of the great garrison in which this curious drama had been enacted. Now that the curtain had fallen, I felt a strong desire to hear something of the principal performer, and to learn what had become of him after his retirement from the stage. In accordance with this wish I lost no time in making my way to the barracks at which my speechless friend's regiment was quartered, bent on picking up all the information I could.

Fortune was propitious to me. Almost immediately on my entering the barrack-square I had the good luck to run against a certain sergeant-major belonging to the regiment, who had had the subject of my inquiries especially under his charge. From this officer I learnt that Dr. Curzon had been removed to another station, and that so the case had passed from under his superintendence; and that the doctor who succeeded to the care of the man had, after very careful investigation of the whole affair, become sufficiently convinced of the genuineness of the case to bring it before the medical board with the result mentioned. "A few days afterwards," said the sergeant, concluding his account, "I met the man walking along the street in company with a young woman. 'Good evening, Strong,' I said on speculation, with a sort of notion in my head that he'd answer me. And so he did. 'Good evening, sergeant,' he says, speaking as glib as possible and with as knowing a grin as ever you saw.' The sergeant concluded his narrative by informing me that the young man had got married, and was at work at a sewing-machine factory in the town.

It was a difficult place to find, this factory; but I managed, after going to all sorts of wrong places, and making inquiry everywhere but where I ought, for "a young man named Strong," to unearth my gentleman in a large bare-looking building which quivered all over with the vibration of the machinery in motion in its upper story.

He was a little thinner and more haggard-looking perhaps, than when I had last seen him, and was of course dressed in the costume of a civilian instead of the uniform of the regiment to which he had once belonged, but in all other respects he was unchanged. He presented the same sharp, watchful appearance which I had remarked before, and had the same keen, restless glance darting suspiciously hither and thither. He did not speak on first coming forward to meet me, but merely made a movement with his head. I think it probable that for a single instant he was confused, seeing a stranger before him, whether he was to be dumb or not. Of course he soon remembered that all that was a thing of the past. In answer to my remark that I was curious to know how he had recovered the use of speech, of which when I had seen him, nearly a couple of years ago, he had been deprived, he proceeded to tell a story which he seemed to have on the tip of his tongue ready for any such emer-

He stated that shortly after his discharge, he accidentally met a young man with whom he was acquainted, and whose function it was to compound the medicines dispensed at a certain military hospital which he mentioned by name. The "compounder," wiser than any of the constituted authorities, told him that he knew of a medicine which would certainly give him back the use of his tongue if he only chose to take the trouble to go up to the hospital and fetch it. Naturally enough ex-private Strong did agree to take that trouble, and, taking the medicine too, observed that after the very first dose his whole interior arrangements were suffused with a glow of warmth; on finishing the bottle, commenced under such happy auspices, he was able to speak, but in a low voice, — "just like a little child."

Such was ex-private Strong's ingenious story. From speaking "like a child," Mr. Strong, after another bottle or two of the wonderful medicine, had got to speak like a grown-up person.

Once and only once in the course of our conversation did my ex-military acquaintance approach the border-land of danger. I had asked him how it happened that he enlisted in the first instance, and he had replied that he hardly knew, — that "he had done it in a kind of freak"; upon which it occurred to me to add, speaking in as careless a tone as I could command, —

"And directly afterwards you were sorry for it?"

"Yes," was his answer, corrected immediately afterwards, and negatived in a very roundabout fashion. Very soon afterwards he announced that it was tea-time at the factory, and beat a rapid retreat.

What qualities are displayed here! What concentration of purpose, what self-denial, what huge development of that which, in sporting phrase, is called the "staying" power, — the power of holding on and sticking to a thing with a fixed intention, day after day, week after week, month after month, for a space of nearly two years! It seems pretty clear that it is not the mere possession of these faculties which is respectable, but only the application of them to a good and worthy purpose.

ONLY FOR THE SEASON.

CHAPTER I.

DR. SECKER MAKES A PROFESSIONAL VISIT.

THE twilight was past, the stars had come out, and a smart March wind shook the tree-tops in the avenue leading to Dykeham, the residence of Sir Francis Crevillon, Baronet.

Dr. Carl Secker drew in his horse before the lodge-gate, and looked down at the woman who opened it with a face expressive of dissatisfaction. He had seen moving lights, like carriage-lamps, amongst the trees, and had heard the rumble of wheels in the drive before him.

"Stop a moment," cried Dr. Secker. "Is there a — is anything unusual going on at the Hall?"

"No, sir; only a dinner-party, I believe."

"Oh!"

Dr. Secker passed on into the drive with speculative slowness. If Sir Francis was about to entertain dinner-guests, he had come on a vain errand, and might almost as well turn back. So it appeared at first sight, or so he made believe that it of the carriages, watching the lights as they vanished behind big trees, and came twinkling into sight again.

"If they had as many starlight rides to take as I have," mused the doctor, "they would learn to do without lamps such a night as this. Well, I think I had better go on. I think I ought to go, professionally. A busy man can't choose his own time for visiting a patient."

He quickened his pace a little, for if he did go on, it was important that he should reach the house before the guests were assembled. He passed a carriage or two, saw a gentleman in black, and had a vision of a white cloud of muslin and lace, and a coronet that glittered like silver. Then a groom took his horse, and he sprang up the steps and became the prey of the first official receiver, whose duty it was to hand him over to the second official receiver, who would relieve him of his coat.

"No," objected the doctor, brusquely, for he did not much like being mistaken for an invited guest; "show me into a morning-room, if you please, and inquire if Miss Crevillon will see me. I shall detain her but a few moments."

He was shown into a morning-room, accordingly, and took up his position on the hearth-rug, after the fashion of English gentlemen in general. While he waited, it occurred to him that his heart was beating a little faster than usual, and that he could not be said to retain that evenness of spirit and nerve which are essential to a medical man in his visits to his patients. A certain sensation of doubt oppressed him as to the propriety of this step which he had taken; also a little haze of unreality began to rise up about the position in which he had believed himself to be placed when he mounted his horse to ride to Dykeham. He could not possibly have dreamed it, he supposed. And, after all, what had dinner-parties, or, indeed, any arrangements at Dykeham to do with his discharge of his professional duties? As all the world knew, his time could not be called his own, and he must pay his visits as he could.

The vision which appeared to him when the door opened would, however, scarcely have been suspected of requiring medical aid. It was a cloud of white, something like that other vision which he had just before seen through a carriage window, only the first was totally uninteresting to him, whilst this one —

He made a step or two forwards, and then stopped.

"Amy!" he said, in a tone not professional.

"O Carl! I ought not to have come. I stole away without their knowledge. If Lady Crevillon were to know, or Joanna —"

"Or Sir Francis," added the doctor. "He would hardly object to your seeing me, Amy. You forget —"

"No, I do not. But you never meant to see Sir Francis this evening?"

"Indeed I did."

"Well, you'll find it to be impossible. And, Carl, I tried to tell Joanna, but she was so hard and dry that I could not do it."

Dr. Secker was standing in the exact spot to which he had advanced to meet her; and he was looking down upon the carpet with a troubled expression.

"Shall I write to Sir Francis, Amy? I feel underhanded."

"Underhanded!" cried Amy. "You! Did n't you cure me when old Dr. Guise would have bungled away my life as a helpless incurable? Who has a better right to care for me than you have?"

Then she went a little closer to him, and put her hand upon his crossed arms.

"Let me tell my guardian myself, Carl. I can manage it better than you."

"But when?"

"Soon. To-morrow there will be people here; and the Hunt Ball at night; and then, the next day, there's the Meet at Redford Bridge."

"Amy!" said the doctor, "you are not going to the Meet?"

"I shall only be driven there in the carriage. It is the last Meet of the season. Let me go, Dr. Secker."

"And the Hunt Ball to-morrow night!" said the doctor, aghast. "You! only within the last month able to walk without assistance —"

"Stop, Carl. I want you to tell me — as my medical adviser, you know, not my — my lover — do you really think I ought not to go to balls?"

Dr. Secker hesitated. The face that looked up to his own was so childlike in its questioning, so simply in earnest about his opinion, so divested of its usual wilfulness and occasional petulance, that he felt obliged to question himself according to her distinction, as the doctor, and not the lover.

"I think dissipation bad for any one: for you, dangerous. A ball, occasionally, is not dissipation; but just at present, when I tremble sometimes to think that your recovery is hardly assured —"

"That will do. I love balls, but —"

"You love me better," said the doctor. "I begin to believe that I have not dreamed it all. You won't tire yourself to-night, Amy? Is it a large party?"

"Stupidly large. Don't you wish you were going to stay and —"

She broke off abruptly. Something in the young doctor's face made her fear lest the words might hurt him, either in his pride or his self-consciousness, about this secret which Sir Francis did not yet suspect. She fancied that his aspect had changed; that it was less glad and assured; and so again she laid her hand upon the arms that were crossed in grim resolve upon his breast.

"O, Carl! Carlo mio! never be hurt at anything I may say in my foolishness. Know better what I mean."

And then the doctor smiled down upon her, and uncrossed his arms, letting one of them draw her to him. He thought of something else just then, which was not exactly pleasant to him; he thought of other arms which might rest, in waltz or galop, where his own was resting then; only how differently! How much less reverential; how carelessly indifferent they would be! He wished a passing wish, which others have felt before him, with reference to such dances, but he did not give it words.

"I must go now," said Amy. "Good by, Carl."

When he was gone she listened a little while, and then went to the window to raise a corner of the curtain and blind, that she might see him ride off. She said to herself once again, very softly, "Carlo mio!" and then the curtain dropped over the window, and she ran up stairs to steal into the drawing-room and be taken into dinner. But as she passed Lady Crevillon, my lady turned round and looked at her, and Amy knew that there would be no longer any secret to keep.

She behaved very well to her neighbors at the dinner-table. She answered their remarks, smiled when it was expected of her, looked with seeming interest, through the glittering silver and the hot-house flowers and ferns, at the row of faces opposite to her; but all the while she was thinking what she should have to say to Sir Francis by and by.

When they were in the drawing-room again Amy saw, without seeming to look at it, the approach of Lady Crevillon's velvet skirt as it swept the carpet and paused at her side.

"Was Dr. Secker here before dinner?" said her ladyship.

"Yes."

"He came to see you, I suppose. I thought he considered your health re-established. Such an hour, too, to come!"

"I dare say he had been busy all day."

Lady Crevillon made a grimace, signifying how extremely unimportant Dr. Secker and his business were in her eyes.

"He should have come before, if he must come. What did he say?"

Amy looked straight up at the gold eyeglass, by the help of which her ladyship was making observations.

"I am not going to tell you, Lady Crevillon," she replied. "I shall tell Sir Francis; but I don't think this is the time to talk about it."

Lady Crevillon smiled, nodded, and passed on. She rather relished that bold speech of Amy's; it showed spirit. But if Dr. Secker could have known, as he rode home in the starlight, the sublime contempt with which her ladyship mentally closed upon him the doors of Dykeham, he might have been still less at ease in his own mind than he was already. If he had thought the matter over, it might have occurred to him before that the baronet would be ready enough to measure the difference between his social standing and Miss Crevillon's. He had, perhaps, perceived this in some vague, general way, without attaching much importance to it; but somehow his ride to-night through Dykeham Park, with the carriages before him, seemed to have quickened his appreciation of it. When he went into his own room—that is, the room in which he generally sat—a sudden chill came over him. It was dingy; no question about that. There was a general air of dreariness about it which annoyed him. Some months ago it had been comfortable enough; but since then he had been called in, much to his own amazement, by Sir Francis Crevillon, to prescribe for that gentleman's ward and distant relative, who was considered a confirmed invalid. Dr. Secker had dispersed that theory; but then he had also fallen in love, and now he began to think that he had done a very mad thing. He looked at the easy-chair, covered with dingy morocco, opposite to him; and he found it impossible to place there, even in imagination, the dainty form he had seen in the morning room at Dykeham. He could think of her there, but here she was incongruous. The doctor's heart sank.

"I wish I was a rich man," he said. "I wish the Seckers—"

And then he broke off. "No I don't; I wish to be nothing but what I am. As to this room, which annoys me, all that can be changed—shall be changed if—"

CHAPTER II.

THE MEET AT REDFORD BRIDGE.

"If you remember," said Lady Crevillon, "I was always against his being called in. Dr. Guise has been the family physician long enough to be trusted, one would think."

"Only Guise did n't cure Amy," replied Sir Francis, dryly.

"How could he? She was taken out of his hands. I dare say, if the truth could be known, it was he who did the real good."

"Scarcely fair to Dr. Secker, Lady Crevillon."

This third speaker was Mrs. Lescar, the Baronet's daughter by a former marriage; and she did not look up to make her moderating remark, but went on with her occupation of teaching the small future baronet to make fishing-flies.

"It's too cold yet, Frank. When the weather gets warmer I'll come with you down the Dyke, and see what we can do."

Amy looked at them all, unable to speak. That Sir Francis should tell his wife about Carl was natural enough; but that Lady Crevillon should bring up the subject thus publicly, and speak of the doctor in such a way, was too intolerable. And there was no one to say a word in defence of the absent, except, indeed, Joanna Lescar, whose mild interpolation fell upon Amy's rising passion like oil on flames.

"Well," resumed her ladyship, "it will be very annoying no doubt. To take up a new doctor, and then discard him for the old one, carries absurdity and whim on the face of it. All I can say is that if my advice had been taken, it would never have happened."

Then Amy found words.

"Discard whom? What nonsense is it you are all talking? What authority has any one here to dispose of—my affairs in this summary manner?"

Mrs. Lescar raised her face from Frank's unskilful manipulations to look at Amy.

"What is the use of getting so excited about it?" she said to herself; and then she added, aloud, "Gently, Amy; you forget yourself."

"Forget myself! I think I am forgotten, rather. What is it they mean? Am I to have no voice in the matter? It concerns me a little, I believe. Were they legislated for in this sort of way, I wonder,—were you, Joanna, when you married Mr. Lescar?"

For so young a widow Joanna was very calm indeed, and even smiling, about her answer.

"That was altogether different. Dr. Secker has his way to make in the world, and therefore the two cases do not admit of comparison. But if I had been legislated for, as you term it, I should have known that it was for my own good."

"It is not for my good," said Amy. "I shall never be good if— But I care nothing about it; I am not going to take back my promise because you all choose to set me aside like a piece of furniture or a spoiled child."

"My dear Amy," said Sir Francis, "nobody accuses you of being spoiled; but you are a child. You are under age, and must remember that I am your guardian. I am bound to say what I think of this very foolish affair,—I can call it nothing better. Indeed, it is altogether out of the question. Any engagement would be out of the question at present. I mean that you must see a little more of the world before you decide that it contains nothing so attractive as the lot of a country doctor's wife down at Redford."

Sir Francis smiled when his speech was made, and sent a sort of imploring look at his ward to spare him any further argument upon a subject which did not admit of two opinions. But Amy rose from the breakfast-table, opened the French window, and went out, without answering, into the shrubbery. The stolid complacency of Lady Crevillon's face was odious to her. All that her ladyship could do she would; and Amy knew well enough that a solid block of obstinacy offered ten times more resistance than the flying outbreaks of remonstrance or anger to which Sir Francis might give vent. As she passed through the shrubbery Frank came running after her, and held out a shawl.

"Joanna says you'll have to be nursed if you get ill again, and you are to put this on."

Amy's first impulse was to thrust away the shawl, and pass on; but a second thought made her take it.

"Tell Joanna my life is more valuable to me than ever it was," she answered. "Never mind about understanding it, Frank; tell her that."

"Do you think I'm a baby?" retorted the boy, nodding. "But if I were you I'd be ill again, and then Secker would have to come. Mind, I don't say you are to do it, but I should. Secker gave me a jolly good gallop on his bay mare yesterday; and he's got the primest fishing-rod you ever saw."

Amy walked on into the park, and reached a spot where a clump of ash-trees partially hid the Dykeham chimneys. She wanted to be out of sight and sound of the house below; to get away from all memory of those jarring voices, with their calm decisions and phlegmatic platitudes. What did they know about it, any of them? What did Joanna, who was young, and ought to know, feel in that dull, passive heart of hers?

"If you get ill you'll have to be nursed." That was all they cared for her, any of them. She did not complain of that; she did not want them to care now. Only, when there was one who did care, why must they set their faces against him, and talk about seeing the world? She wanted nothing more out of the world than had been given to her,—one heart out of it all for her own.

A clock in the ungainly tower which marked the Dykeham stables struck ten, and she started up with a sudden recollection that eleven was the hour for the Meet at Redford Bridge, and she had told Carl she should be there. And she had to get back to the house and dress.

"Which I shall do," she reflected, "in just ten minutes. I must go after saying I should. He might be there."

She did not consider how very improbable it was that the doctor would have any time to spare for such a purpose. She knew, indeed, as a general fact, that he was busy from morning till night; but she did not apply the knowledge in this case.

No one made any remark when she went down stairs dressed to go with Lady Crevillon and Joanna. They seemed to take it as a matter of course that this little affair was of no consequence,—a trifle which would blow over and make no difference. The less said about it the better.

"If Dr. Secker makes a formal application to you," said Lady Crevillon, "of course you will decidedly refuse your consent."

Sir Francis bit his lip. He was fond of considering himself totally unbiassed by his wife, and dependent only on his own judgment. He said, briefly, "I shall think about it. Too violent an opposition would be as foolish as compliance."

And the subject was dropped. He rode down to the Meet beside his wife's carriage, very silent the whole time, looking at Amy occasionally with some faint stirring of pity and sympathy coming up from under the weight of years and going forth towards her. This young doctor was a fine, generous fellow; there could be no doubt about that; and then he came of a good family. As to his generosity, ask the starving poor, who huddled together in the back-slums and alleys of Redford. As a magistrate, and chairman of the Board of Guardians at the Redford Union, Sir Francis knew a little more of these miserable paupers than his wife did, and of the doctor who never refused to help them, and never asked a fee from those who could not afford to give it.

Did Amy really care very much for him? Would it hurt her to give him up? Did she care as much as he, the baronet, had cared years ago, when—"Pish!" ejaculated Sir Francis, fretfully; "what's the use of that?"

It did not look like being unhappy, he thought, to come of her own free will to see the hounds throw off. She should go with him and Lady Crevillon up to town, and that would shake it all off, if he knew anything of a girl's nature. When they reached the bridge and stood amongst a crowd of other carriages, men in red coats and men in black coats, ready mounted, and a pack of motley followers on foot out of the town, Sir Francis went to Amy's side and spoke good-humoredly.

"If the carriage follows far enough you'll see one or two of those ladies take the fence up at Pecket's withy-bed in gallant style. Don't you wish you were mounted?"

"No, Sir Francis."

The baronet turned away disappointed. He wanted to forget all that little morning scene, and to get over the effects of it, and Amy's respectfully antagonistic reply vexed him. Nevertheless, he told the coachman to keep up with the others as far as Pecket's withy-bed; and Amy did see one or two ladies take the fence, from which sight she turned away uttering a single word of disapproval, which might perhaps be partially due to her disappointment in not having seen anything of Dr. Secker.

"It's what I never could do in my life," said Joanna, bending forward with some show of eagerness. "But those girls are more at home in the hunting-field than the ball-room. Their costume last night was absurd in the extreme. We shall see what sort of figure they cut at luncheon."

"In my young days," said Lady Crevillon, "I could have taken such a fence as that myself; but I seldom did it. I don't think fast young ladies were admired in those days. Now we had better go home; there is never any run to speak of here, even if they find, which is doubtful, and I should like to be comfortably at home before the people begin to come back."

It was some time after this that Dr. Secker, riding slowly up the road towards Redford, saw the carriages turn one after another into the Dykeham drive, and could not help stopping to look after them. He scanned the scarlet cloaks, the black hats with their tiny white feathers, the tiger-skin rugs and the heraldic devices with an unquiet mind. It was not altogether that he had thought to find Amy Crevillon amongst them and failed. The contrast which all this presented to himself on his jaded horse, himself worn out and hungry, and the commonplace home, with its commonplace appliances, to which he was going, pressed upon him uncomfortably. What had he done? What would the world, at least its representatives in this neighborhood, say he had done? They talked of Miss Crevillon as an heiress. That the supposition was as likely to be false as true he believed. He cared nothing about it, but then who would believe that of him?

He turned away from the Dykeham lodge and passed on. He went home and ate his dinner drearily, wondering if Amy had told Sir Francis, and if so, what had Sir Francis said; and lastly, what would Sir Francis say to a letter which was even then in course of compilation in the young man's mind?

CHAPTER III.

THE YOUNG MAY MOON.

It shone already in the evening sky, while the departing sun scattered tints of gold and purple over the earth, and threw long shadows down from the trees in the Dykeham shrubbery.

For a whole month until now Dr. Secker had seen Amy but once, and that once accidentally. Coming out of that region in the town of Redford which was called emphatically the Irish quarter, Carl, emerging suddenly into one of the broader streets, saw the dark-blue panels of the Dykeham carriage as it drove past. He saw also a quick, impulsive, and openly eager recognition of himself as he stood in that dark opening which led to the Irish quarter, and he forgot all the misery he had left behind him to follow in his thoughts that carriage up the Dykeham drive. He had seen her, and had been recognized. It was odd, he thought, that this sense of contrast should so pertinaciously trouble him. There was something false about it he knew, something which would not bear analysis. Only, the thing was, had he been wise and right in trying to bring Amy down from this luxurious life of hers? Was it right of him to wish that she could share his anxieties and cares as well as his joys? Dr. Secker could not answer the question to his own satisfaction. If he had been less thoughtful and clear-sighted he might have said, "She shall never know anything but joy; my cares I will keep from her"; but he knew better than to say so, or to think so.

Since that meeting in Redford, however, the aspect of affairs had changed a little. The doctor had got the answer from Sir Francis, and found himself hardly able to comprehend his own position. Sir Francis represented himself as standing in the place of Amy's father. He could not give his consent to his ward's entering into any such engagement as the one Dr. Secker did her the honor to propose, — at present. He considered that she was very young, — too young, indeed, to know her own mind. He required that she should see a little more of the world before entering into one of those rash compacts which young people are so ready to make and so apt to regret. He did not wish to be tyrannical; so far as he could see there was no need for any violent rupture between his ward and Dr. Secker. Such things were always remarked upon and productive of mischievous gossip. He thought it better, however, that they should not meet often just at present; and then Sir Francis prosed a little and finished off, leaving the doctor in a hopeless maze of uncertainty and confusion. It seemed to him that the whole thing was treated in the slightest possible way, as an affair of no importance, which was, in fact, exactly the view Sir Francis wished to be taken of it. He did not wish to oppose his ward with any strength of entreaty or command; it would, he thought, be both troublesome and productive of harm instead of good; and as he meant to remove her from the doctor's neighborhood, there was no need absolutely to forbid their meeting at present.

But the doctor did not wait to be forbidden; he would not go to Dykeham to put himself in the way of being insulted by Lady Crevillon or her husband. His resolution might have failed him; the fever of indignation and pride into which he had worked himself might not have been strong enough to keep him away when he heard about the town journey; but before he did hear of it chance favored him. He saw Amy at the Dykeham lodge in passing, and then all his anger, and pride, and self-torment fled away, and in another moment he was walking up the drive with her. He would do nothing underhanded; if he met her and spoke to her they should know that he did so; and therefore he meant to go up the whole length of the drive, into the shrubbery, and before the windows, in order that no one might accuse him of any clandestine dealing.

"And so Sir Francis did n't tell you?" began Amy. And then she stopped and looked at the doctor, with the dying sunlight on his face, and an instinctive knowledge that she was going to give him pain made her put up her left hand to clasp its fellow round his arm.

"Did n't tell me what?" said Carl.

"That he and Lady Crevillon are going to town, and —"

"You are going with them?"

"Yes."

"No," said Carl, "he did n't tell me that."

"But it is only for the season."

"Oh!" ejaculated the doctor, "only for the season!"

As he said it that last ray of sunlight left the earth, and Carl's face grew very dark as he looked on straight into the western clouds.

So this was the plan, then. They meant to take her away into that unquiet whirl which would be so bad for her; they meant to make her forget him if they could; perhaps they would succeed; they meant to marry her to some more desirable catch in the matrimonial market, if the thing were possible. Of one thing he was very certain. If she went up to town and lived the life usually lived by young ladies in their first season it would kill her.

"Amy," said the doctor, "are they mad do you suppose?"

"Who?"

He did not answer. A sullen spirit of self-renunciation came upon him. He would give her up; he would go to Sir Francis then and relinquish all claim, — as if he had any claim! Well, then, he might promise never to see her again if they would leave her in peace.

"It is nothing so very shocking, Carl; and it is n't my fault. You should not look angry about it."

"Angry!" repeated Carl, turning towards her. "Perhaps it does look like anger, too. It is only because I find it so terrible to think of losing you, Amy. It is because I know, if no one else does, how small an exertion will be too much for you; and I know also something of a young lady's life in the London season."

"It will not be necessary for me to do all that other young ladies do."

"But you won't like being left behind."

"I shall like doing what I know would please you. I shall take care of myself."

But that was not all. There was another fear, perhaps even less easy to lay to rest than that one. After all, was it absolutely necessary that she should go? Had Sir Francis any real, valid authority to take her from him? — unless, indeed, it had been her own choice to go! He drew back his arm sharply as the thought occurred to him. He wanted to ask her that question, but somehow he dreaded the answer too much to ask it.

"I would n't go if I could help it," said Amy. "But Sir Francis has been very kind, Carl; and it is better to give way in a small matter like this, you know."

A small matter! It is probable that the doctor thought it anything but a small matter.

"And then, if you would but be happy about it, I really think I should enjoy it, Carl. In six months' time I shall be twenty-one, and my own mistress."

As though she had read a certain bitter thought of his, some vague reflection of it came into Amy's own mind as they walked on slowly towards the house. When they reached the shrubbery gate, she said, all at once, "Carl, what is it you are afraid of?"

But he would not tell her.

Amy leaned against the gate and looked at him, possibly not altogether displeased at the thought she had detected.

"Say good by to me here, Carl. If we go into the house, there will be Lady Crevillon, and she will watch us. We shall have to bow to each other like two solemn ghosts, for they don't believe that I mean to keep my word to you. Good by."

"Good by, my love, — my own dear love!"

"Listen," said Amy; "I kiss you because you are a coward. I know what it is you are afraid of. People say a man's faith is n't like a woman's, and I begin to think so myself. They will not let you bind me by any engagement. But, understand, Carl, that I am bound. Until you yourself, of your own free will, give me back my promise I am yours. Remember that!"

They passed through the gate, and came suddenly upon Mrs. Lescar, walking to meet them through the shrubs. Amy repressed a start of dismay, repeated "Good by, Carl," and ran into the house; and the doctor shook hands with Mrs. Lescar in some confusion. He fancied that she had heard those last words. He thought, too, that her passionless face was a little less calm than usual, — a little touched with some faint reflection of an emotion of which he had hardly conceived her capable. On the impulse of the moment, and under the influence of that passing sympathy, he spoke.

"Mrs. Lescar, I am very unhappy. I think Sir Francis scarcely understands how very much his ward stands in need of care, — how very fragile she is."

Mrs. Lescar smiled gravely.

"Lady Crevillon will see to that, I think. It is scarcely in my father's line."

"One word more," said the doctor, stammering; "a very great favor. You will remain here, I believe. If I might sometimes be permitted to call — to hear — there can be no great harm in my hearing occasionally through you —"

As he did not seem to know exactly what he wanted to say, and Mrs. Lescar did, she interrupted him to answer. She really had been touched for a moment by Amy's bold little speech, and the doctor was quite right. There could be no harm in his calling at Dykeham now and then to inquire after an old patient. It might even be productive of good. So she said, "Yes, I shall remain at Dykeham for the present; Frank will be left at home, and he is a great charge. Come as often as you like, Dr. Secker."

He made his acknowledgments and went away, Amy watching him from the window of her own room as long as he was in sight. Then she turned to the dressing-table, began to collect and pick up the little ornaments and trinkets, and suddenly dropped them all again, and put her face down on the table with a great sob.

"O Carl! — Carlo mio! If I should die in that great, stupid London, and never see him again! Nobody ever loved me before that I remember! Why are they so hard upon us? What does it matter to them?"

Dr. Secker walked back toward the town leisurely, and the moon got brighter and brighter above his head. He looked up, and saw that there were no clouds over her, — none near her. Surely he might take it as a good omen. She danced in a thousand silver ripples upon the river, and lighted up the big red stones, which marked the ford, a good half-mile from the bridge. The water was so low that he could see the stones, like a path, the whole way across.

It would save him a mile's walk round, he thought, and he went over, slipping two or three times, and hearing the water sop out of his boots as he walked on dry land again. For this, or any other physical discomfort, he did not at that moment care. He turned his face towards those woods, dark in the distance, amongst which he could no longer see the roof that covered Amy. But the moon was shining over it, and him, and the beautiful, quiet scene around him. The light of her promise was in his heart; what had he to do with anything but hope and loyal trust?

CHAPTER IV.

LADY CREVILLON'S LETTER.

The young May moon grew old, and her lustre faded, and Dr. Secker began to wonder why it was that each day's work seemed to take the heart out of him in a way it had never been used to do. Mrs. Lescar could have nothing to do with it. Her immovable face chilled him, it was true, and her wise, even incontestable remarks and speeches; but then that must have been his own fault. She always spoke sensibly, when she did speak. She was friendly towards him; as friendly, he thought, as it was her nature to be towards any one. He had not tested her very much, nor taken too frequent advantage of her general invitation. Why was it that, go to Dykeham as hopeful as he would, he always left it with a sinking heart? — as though he had been in the presence of a silent, secret protest against his love for Amy!—as though, by the working of some subtle influence, he would have to come by and by to the acknowledgment that he had done a thing unwise, not quite right, and in-consequent, since nothing could ever come of it! He could not tell why it was.

More moons passed away, and the fields were getting yellow for the harvest. Through the hot sun of August the doctor walked one day across those yellow fields to the Red Ford, and thence to Dykeham. Mrs. Lescar, sitting at an open window, saw him coming up the drive at a distance, and the wool-work on which she was engaged dropped for a single idle moment on her lap. How long would the doctor continue to come to her for news of Amy?

It came into her head just then that she would show him a letter which Lady Crevillon had written to her two or three days ago. She was no mischief-maker; had no desire to hurt any one; in her passionless way, she felt at times that it was rather a pity the young doctor had allowed himself to get into this troublesome knot. For it was now, and had been from the first, her opinion that nothing serious could ever come of the engagement. She hardly knew why. Perhaps, as people so often do, she put together her friend's circumstances and her own feelings. She could never have thought of marrying the doctor. As to loving him, that was altogether another matter. If a man is your husband of course you will love him,—so Joanna held. But she, if she had been about to marry, would have looked out for what the world might look upon and approve of as a good match, a proper, perhaps wealthy, alliance. So Amy should do, of course; and so she would find out for herself, after seeing a little of life. The sooner this foolish, childish arrangement was forgotten, the better.

"Secker's coming!" said Master Frank, putting his head into the room with noisy abruptness.

Mrs. Lescar disliked a noise, but she also disliked the trouble of reproving her young step-brother, who generally maintained his right to the last word.

"Come here, Frank, and pick up my wool-case. Thank you. What makes you so fond of Dr. Secker?"

"Because he's no end of a sw— No, he is n't a swell, either. Because he's a brick."

"But you know that those words are vulgar, and meaningless too. What can be the sense of calling a man a brick? Wait a bit, I have n't done with you. Dr. Secker has business with me, and I don't wish you to be in the way. You had better go on with your play until he has finished what he has to say to me, then you can come in."

The young gentleman uttered a groan of strong disapproval, kicked over a footstool, and banged the door after him.

A quarter of an hour after that Mrs. Lescar was sitting opposite the doctor, working away as busily as if her daily bread had depended upon that mass of beads and tent stitch. And Dr. Secker had a letter in his hand, which, however, by this time he was only pretending to read, having mastered its contents some time since.

"A little gayety seems to have done my cousin no harm," said Joanna.

Dr. Secker would have felt that there was quiet malice in the speech, if his faculties had been awake to take it in. As it was, he felt an insane desire to fling that one word back to her, and say, "She is not your cousin; she is no relation to you."

Mrs. Lescar looked very composed and quiet—too quiet to hurt any one; but a wasp is quiet while he stings you.

It was the doctor's own fault that he had read that letter. Joanna simply broke off in her answer to his inquiries, and said, "Perhaps you would like to see for yourself what Lady Crevillon says."

What he had seen might not, at another time, have taken so strong an effect upon him, though he could hardly have disregarded it altogether; but now it fell upon that confused heap of queries and doubts which Mrs. Lescar had helped to pile up in his mind; and it fell also upon a paragraph which he had read in that morning's newspaper, and had called "Lies, like most other reports." The paragraph ran thus:—

"A marriage is on the tapis between Lord Frederic Page and Miss Crevillon, daughter of the late Colonel Crevillon, and ward of Sir Francis Crevillon, of Dykeham."

And in Lady Crevillon's letter he read, "Lord Frederic is very attentive, and I am quite sure Amy likes him in her heart. But she seems anxious and unhappy; and unless there was some promise ungenerously extorted from her before she left home, which she, poor child, thinks it would be dishonorable to break, I cannot understand her. She evidently liked him so much at first, and now she is shy,—has taken to blushing; and once after he had been here I saw her crying."

Dr. Secker sat for some time very quiet, but the movement of Mrs. Lescar's long needle and the flying about of a piece of crimson wool tortured him. He got up and walked about the room trying with all his might to find out what he ought to do, and do it, or, at any rate, resolve to do it. Lady Crevillon's words were offensive enough; the more so because he knew now that report had not lied when it called Amy an heiress. Everything was against him. Mrs. Lescar knew well enough what he was thinking about, but she had no intention of arguing the matter with him. She did not mean to give herself any trouble, or stir in the affair at all vehemently. If he asked her opinion he should have it, as indeed he always did have it.

"Freddy Page," said Mrs. Lescar, meditatively. "Why, he was a little boy in pinafores when I first knew him! To be sure that must be fifteen years ago. I suppose he is about Amy's age. As a boy he was very handsome; but good-looking boys don't always develop into handsome men."

All this was gall and wormwood to the doctor, fretting him intolerably. What possible interest did she suppose he would take in hearing about the good looks of Lord Frederic Page?

"Do you think," said Carl at last, weakly yielding to his pain, perplexity, and bitter longing that some one should throw a little discredit on the statement,— "do you think it is true that—that Amy—"

He turned back without finishing the speech to his walk up and down the room.

"Dr. Secker," said Joanna, "believe me when I say I am very sorry for you."

So she was. The calmest hearts dislike to witness suffering; and suffering was so very palpable in the doctor's tone and manner that she could not help seeing it.

"Very sorry," she repeated. "But I always give my opinion frankly when it is asked; and I always did think that this affair was unfortunate; never likely to lead to anything but pain for you, possibly for Amy also. Opposition was a thing she would not tolerate; the very thought of it only made her more determined and rebellious. But then she was very young, and had been so long an invalid, that very great allowance must be made for her."

The doctor, touched by the unwonted energy of that "very sorry," walked up to her and said, putting his hands together, as he did when he was agitated, —

"Then you think, Mrs. Lescar, — for I know you heard that promise of Amy's, — you think I ought to release her from it?"

"I think," said Joanna, "that you would be acting the part of a wise and generous man if you did so."

The doctor stood to all appearance calmly looking down upon the wool-work, and streaks of crimson and gold crossed each other in intricate confusion before his eyes. This was the hardest thing he had ever been called upon to do in his whole life. He was not yet sure that he could do it.

"If it is for her happiness —" he said. And then he held out his hand. "Good-by, Mrs. Lescar. I must think about it."

Joanna looked at him with some faint stirring of admiration, as she had looked at the two ladies who took the double ditch at Pecket's withy-bed; a little pity, too, she felt, but no remorse. She had only acted for the best, and, so far as she knew it, had told the truth.

"Would you like this?" she said, offering him the letter. "Take it if you would. It may be a help to you to refer to it."

The doctor took it without a word, and went away. But he did not go home. He went about the whole sultry afternoon amongst the poorest and most wretched of his patients. He might have had some dim thought of self-teaching in this; of bringing before himself misery of another kind, but so far as appearance went, infinitely greater than his own. But he was not very clear in his own mind what he did it for. He never went home till the moon had risen; another moon; never more the same radiant queen that had shone for him on that May night long past. Well, it had been a mistake. Better far that it had been discovered now than that she should have married him to find it out afterwards.

And then he went in to write his letter, — a letter so sorrowful and tender, in spite of all his honest efforts to make it exactly what it should be, and no more; — a full and unreserved release from that promise by which she held herself bound, and which he feared had been a grave error; — that the answer for which he watched daily struck him when it came, like a blow upon a broken limb. There were in Amy's envelope two words only in answer to the letter which had cost him so much. They were, "Very well!" written seemingly in careless haste; the "V" blotted and repeated in inverse on the fold of the paper. They could have cost her scarcely a moment, or a moment's thought, he said in his bitterness. No hesitation; not a single backward look of remorse for what he must suffer. Well, whatever that might be, he was glad that she should be unhurt. And thus they parted.

CHAPTER V.

AMONGST THE FALLEN GRAIN.

Dr. Secker was right, inasmuch as her two words of answer had cost Amy no deliberation. How could she deliberate? He made no charge against her, or himself. He simply absolved her from her word to him. Under the circumstances there was but one thing to be done, and she did it.

Lady Crevillon knew nothing of the matter from Amy; knew nothing of it in fact until she heard from Joanna; consequently she did not understand the sudden change of manner which was apparent in Amy just at this time. On the morning of the arrival of Carl's letter Amy, having sealed her own reply to it, turned to her ladyship and said, —

"I should like to change my mind and go with you to-night, if I may."

Lady Crevillon made a slight gesture of astonishment before she answered, —

"Come by all means. But I thought you said that one hearing of Faust was enough?"

Amy could not explain, "I refused for Carl's sake, and because I knew Lord Frederic would be there and would join us." She said nothing, therefore, allowing Lady Crevillon to think what she liked. It was quite true that she herself did not care about hearing Faust again. It must be recollected that this was her first season in town, and she had certain angles of simplicity and prejudice which were yet to be worn smooth. The dying scene frightened her. It seemed a terrible thing to see so many figures sink on their knees in the presence of a death which was only mimicry. The contrivance for taking poor Gretchen's soul to heaven appeared to her so palpably clumsy that it gave her a feeling of relief after the awful reality of the former scene; but she did not care to go through it all a second time. Altogether she had not thought it would be giving up much to spend one evening at home and alone. But now all that was changed.

Carl himself, if he had seen her, would have been at a loss to find the source of that wonderful brilliancy which rose to her eyes, the carmine that tinted her lips, and the atmosphere of strong excitement that surrounded her. He might have liked to sit in the stalls and watch her furtively; he might have looked on and dreamed himself back into the enchanted palace until the advent of another figure, dark-robed, sinister, — the figure of Lord Frederic Page, which placed itself beside Lady Crevillon. Then he would have turned away. He could not have remained to see another man devote himself to the goddess who had once trodden the floor of his own airy castle.

When Amy went home that night she did what was still more astonishing to Lady Crevillon, unless indeed, her ladyship reflected, Lord Frederic was in reality effacing all traces of that unhappy Redford entanglement.

"Lady Crevillon," said Amy, "you remember the proposal you and Sir Francis were good enough to make this morning, and to which I objected?"

"Proposal! What, about taking you —"

"Yes," interrupted Amy. "I have no longer any objection; indeed, I should like it very much."

Lady Crevillon did not this time make any remark, as she had done about Faust. She was very well contented, though she could not help remembering together with the morning's proposal Amy's very decided "No. I want to go back to Dykeham," and wondering a little at the change. But of course it was all for the best. Her ladyship knew that Joanna would take care of Frank; she could trust her step-daughter so far, since if Joanna cared for any one in the world it was Frank. Yes, of course it was for the best. The longer they could keep Amy away from that Redford man the better.

And the unhappy doctor went about his work as usual, and did his best to bear his sorrow like a brave man, stopping every now and then in the midst of other thoughts to think about her; stopping in his country walks to lean over stiles and watch, first the green hay fly about from the ponderous, many-spiked machines of blue and red; after that the corn as it fell down before the scythes and sickles of the reapers; and finally the motley throng of gleaners, legal and illegal, who rushed in to quarrel over the fragments of the spoil, and to announce that harvest was over. Dr. Secker moved amongst these, an absent spectator; hearing the sounds of them dully, as one hears the accompaniment to an air. He was far away in the big city of cities. He was in a mighty region of the mighty west. He was here and there in the flash of a polished scythe in the sunlight, and the busy tinkle of the whetstone was to him the far-off music of trained bands. He saw the Serpentine where other eyes looked down upon the pleasant Dyke. The gate on which he leaned became to him the railing of Rotten Row. And as he looked upon the riders he saw, — who was that fairest amongst the fair equestrians, and who was her escort? Not Sir Francis, but the other one, the boy on the other side? Intuitively he sketched the portrait of the young noble. The dainty, town-bred pallor, the light, downy mustaches and whiskerless young cheeks; the splendid riding equipment, and the glossy horse with a neck like Diana's bow.

How could he, Carl Secker, ever have thought to keep to himself a pearl so rare as that one lost to him now?

When the harvest was over there was a thanksgiving service, and a great day of festivity and rejoicing in Redford. The doctor had not meant to be present amongst the merry-makers; he was not in a state of mind for the sort of thing. He thought he should do better by going to visit those whom feebleness or infirmity would keep at home. His patients said of him that his manner was gentler and kinder than it had ever been; as perhaps it was. But when in passing homewards he saw the big tent and the flags flying above it, Dr. Secker stopped, as he used to stop and watch the reapers, to look over the hedge into the field. He saw men and women who had feasted and were merry; he saw big boys and little boys tumbling over each other for the very glee and abandon of the thing, to the music of the "Dixie's Land Polka," the most popular melody which the Redford band had on its list. The doctor saw also a group of ladies and gentlemen standing in the entrance to the tent, and while he was looking on, Mrs. Lescar and Frank left the group and moved a little farther up the field. Carl had not troubled Mrs. Lescar much of late; he had rather held aloof from any meeting with her. Through her the stab had come; and however little she had been to blame, the sight of her was not pleasant to his eyes. But now it came into his mind that September was nearly over, and the Dykeham family would probably be coming back soon. It was nothing to him, of course, but still he thought he should like to know; so he went into the field and joined the two as they stood near the impromptu orchestra.

"They all seem very happy, don't they?" said Mrs. Lescar. "I have been helping to supply these people with tea, Dr. Secker. I wonder what you, as a medical man, would have thought of the quantity of that fluid and of ponderous plum-cake which a single individual can make away with."

"Poor things!" said the doctor. "They don't get it very often, some of them."

"No? A very good thing for them, too, I should say."

The doctor refrained from asking any question. He was certain that Joanna knew what he had joined her for, and he would not give her the triumph of seeing his impatience.

"I suppose you won't stay here long," he said. "The days begin to close in early."

"No, we shall be going directly. You never come to Dykeham now, Dr. Secker. Too busy, I suppose? I heard from Lady Crevillon this morning. They are — Frank, Frank, how very rude! Let me be gone —"

"Never mind him," interrupted the doctor. "Frank and I are old friends. They are coming home, did you say?"

"No. Going down the Rhine. Probably thence to Rome, but the route seems uncertain."

The doctor would have liked to go away then; but he felt Joanna's eye upon him, calmly curious, as though she wondered, just as a matter of curiosity, how this news affected him.

"I hope — that they are all well," said Carl.

"Quite well, I believe, thank you. Lady Crevillon says my cousin is anticipating the journey with great delight. But that is natural; she has never been able to travel much before. I believe Lord Frederic Page and his sister are about to take a similar tour."

In all this Carl felt, with a sting of exasperated rebellion, that there was cruelty, — cold and tranquil cruelty. He could forgive her for playing with him a little at first. People do that sometimes to increase their own importance as the holders of valuable information; but she need not have told him about Amy's delight. Why did she do it? Was it experimental, or for the mere pleasure of using her power to torment?

He said something about its getting late, and took off his hat to her, eschewing the customary handshake. Joanna's hand was cold, like herself. He could feel it through her glove; passionless, limp, incapable of giving a strong, healthy grasp.

He was not to get away thus, however. He had forgotten Master Frank's efforts to attract his attention; but the young gentleman was at his elbow before he got to the gate of the field.

"I say, why would n't you listen to me just now? Can you row, doctor?"

"Row!" repeated Carl, helplessly. "Row what?"

"A boat, to be sure. I'm going to have one. Pecket, the basket-maker, has got one, and it only wants painting up. It's to be painted green, and it will cost a lot of money; but it's to be a regular little clipper. I shall keep it under the willows in Davis's Hole; but mind, you are not to tell."

To the doctor's mind, distracted with other thoughts, the boy's speech was very hazy; but he heard something about a boat, and Davis's Hole, and tried to subdue his own impatience, and humor the lad's enthusiasm for the new toy, as he generally did.

"It's to be a yacht complete, eh? Sails and rigging, of course, and a crew from Lilliput. Well, I'll come and see you sail it some day; but mind, Frank, don't you go too near Davis's Hole. Remember what it was named from. Keep to the ponds in the park."

The doctor did not see the look of amazement and contempt with which Frank received his advice, nor hear the tone in which the boy repeated to himself, "See me sail it! Keep to the ponds in the park, indeed!" He was too much occupied to think anything more just then of Frank or his amusements. "Amy was anticipating her journey with much delight"; and Lord Frederic would be with her.

Well, it was quite clear that he himself had done right; nay, it was just possible that Mrs. Leascar had been actuated by a kindly motive in telling him all this, and he had wronged her. She might have wished to satisfy him as to the wisdom of his proceeding. Yes, of course he had done right; and now it was all over, and he could never hope to see Amy again, unless, indeed, he saw her as the wife of Lord Frederic Page. He hoped he never might do that. He said words which were not gentle at all respecting Lord Frederic, in which he was unjust, since Lord Frederic had never injured him knowingly in any way; but people in the doctor's present circumstances are not always just. He looked up at the blank windows of his house with a dull impatience. If there had only been some stirring time before him, some great rush of work or excitement! But to go on in the same mill-horse round of visits; to bear patiently with the garrulous list of new diseases, or new symptoms of the hypochondriac up at Redford Grange, who expected to see him daily, and to have a daily change of treatment; to listen to and answer the well-known phrases of his richer patients; and then the never-failing, "Ah, thin, doctor, sure it's the drink 'tices him; if it was n't for that he'd be as good to us as gold," of the Irish quarter. And all this with the consciousness sore about his heart that the one star which had filled his path with tender light was gone from the sky, to shine no more for him forever.

CHAPTER VI.

DROWNED IN THE BAY OF NAPLES.

Dr. Secker was walking down the drive from Dykeham, and the purple shadows of an October sunset fell across the road before him, but he never noticed them. He was thinking about the sentence with which Mrs. Leascar had greeted him, herself unmoved, yet uttering the words with a certain rhythm of the solemn dignity which always hangs about such tidings.

"A very shocking thing has happened, Dr. Secker. Lord Frederic Page is dead; drowned in the Bay of Naples."

Whatever more she had said, or he had answered, the doctor scarcely knew. He was only anxious to get away from the presence of the woman who spoke so quietly of an event which filled him at once with a strange terror. He could not get rid of the words; they came back like an echo from the dumb lips of pictures on the walls; they repeated themselves to his footsteps when he walked away from the house;

they sounded in the cawing of homeward-wheeling rocks above him,—"Drowned in the Bay of Naples!"

He might have heard, if he would, a boy's voice calling to him; or he might have seen a dark boyish figure running in the direction of the lodge to meet him there. But the doctor saw nothing but the sunlight flashing along a blue bay, and the ripple of cool waters that lapped the shore, and whispered to it of the prey borne from its bosom too late. He was thinking what a terrible thing it is to be cut off suddenly, without a shadow of warning out of the very midst of all the sunny joys that cluster round a smooth young life and make it dear. No spark of hope rose on the sadness of the doctor's picture. If such a sparkle had risen he would have hated himself, and fought it back, but none such did rise. The thing was too sudden, too terrible. Individual hopes and possibilities were swallowed in the awfulness of this one stroke which had cut down a man in his prime from off the golden earth. Of all the merry party that were with the drowned man— young and hearty like himself—not one had perished. All were picked up and brought to consciousness again save this one. For him there was no more any throb to come into the still heart; no more any word of love or joy or pain to issue from the silent lips. And there was a widowed mother to mourn for him, and brothers older and younger than himself, and a sister. But it was of none of these that Carl Secker thought when his imagination travelled from this individual unit of the human mass fighting vainly with the waters of death to those left behind.

It was of Amy that he thought, — Amy, whom he had taught himself to associate constantly with the dead man. It was for her that his heart ached; for her he was sorry, — sorry with an intensity of pity which had nothing in it, as he fancied, of the old love. In the presence of death that must be still and dead too. Another love had lived for her; had been to her perhaps what she once was to him. The doctor's heart was very sad for her; it went out to her with that puzzled, painful incertitude which longs to comfort, but can find no way. He could not comfort her; no one living could. Into the space, brief, but to him a measureless gulf, which separated them had been crowded for her, as for himself, the joy and sorrow of a life. Where was she now? Whose lips would comfort her for those which never were to speak to her again?

Time, or rather thought, which acknowledges no time nor space, had fled very fast with him since he heard those tidings. A shadowy notion came to him of having heard them before, long ago, or something like them, or of having dreamed them. Was there anything of the dreamer about him now, and should he wake up presently to find it all false?

He struck his cane upon the gravel sharply, and walked on. Outside the lodge-gate the figure which had been running to meet him stood, flinging stones in the direction of the river.

The doctor looked at Frank Crevillon doubtfully, as though he, too, might have sprung from the misty land of brain-created ghost, and was hardly to be spoken to; but Frank jerked away his last pebble, and turned round.

"I wanted to see you, doctor. Nobody will tell unless it is you, and I wanted to remind you that you must n't. I mean about my boat. You see they are coming home, and they would be worse now than ever, because —"

Of the whole sentence Dr. Secker seized only that one salient point, that one brief phrase which sent the rest into the background of total obscurity. Mrs. Lescar had told him nothing of that, and he had laid his hand on the boy's shoulder, and cut short his speech with an abrupt sharpness for which Frank was not prepared."

"Coming home!" repeated Carl. "Never mind your playthings now; who are coming?"

"Papa and mamma, to be sure, and Amy and then—"

"O Frank!" ejaculated the doctor, in a strange hoarse voice, "be a good boy to her—to them. Be very gentle and good to them. Remember they have had a terrible shock."

And Carl walked away rapidly, leaving the boy to stand in the road and stare after him with an expression of helpless bewilderment.

"Who has had a terrible shock?" he grumbled. "What shock? What makes him, of all people, so cranky with a fellow? I wonder does he take my boat for a plaything, really? Well, I don't think he'll blab; he's not the sort."

CHAPTER VII.

IN THE PLEASANT DYKE.

A November day, but still sunny and genial. Dr. Secker passed up the side of the dyke towards the Red Ford, from whence, in this autumn barrenness of foliage, Dykeham would be plainly visible. He scarcely took the trouble to ask himself why that path was chosen. She was at home again; but then she was nothing to him, so it could not be that. The old places might know her again, but he never saw her. She was ill. From day to day he saw the carriage of Dr. Guise turn in at the drive gate, and knew that the old man was going to see Amy. Was it grief, he wondered, or the sudden shock, or had she in reality overtaken herself, as he once feared she would do?

There was no knowing this; no knowing what Dr. Guise thought in the impenetrability of his own mind, about the case over which he shook his head and mumbled predilections which might mean something or nothing. Carl did not care to make too many inquiries of Dr. Guise. The old man and the young one were not antagonistic; but they differed, as youth and age will. Especially in this case Carl's lips were sealed. He wondered, as he walked on, switching the bushes with his stick, what sort of treatment Dr. Guise affected, and whether it was of any use. He did not wish that he himself had been called in. The thing would have been too painful, too impossible. Not that he could not be perfectly calm about Amy, thinking of her sorrow with a brother's pity; but then he did not want to be brought into closer contact with her. In that, Sir Francis had been wise. But he could not help speculating about her. Would she wear mourning? The doctor was not very clear in his own mind as to the propriety or impropriety of such a course, but somehow he thought she would wear it. There went the carriage, with those black horses which were the special pets of Dr. Guise, up under the beeches amongst which he had watched the lights of other carriages gleaming fitfully on a March night which he remembered. Would it have been better for him if he had turned back that night? if he had written to Sir Francis and got, as he probably would have done then, while the baronet was unprepared, a decisive answer? Better if he had acquiesced in that answer, and seen Amy no more? He thought not; and the question was idle. He had gone on; he had seen Amy; he had had at least a share of life's sweetest moments; and to lose the memory of them would be to make the past a blank as well as the future. And it was all over, now,—all over now and forever; and he could see, he thought, that it was better it should be so.

In a moment of time, quicker than any pen could write the words, or any tongue speak them the full consciousness and details of a sudden terrible emergency came upon the doctor as he passed from behind the shadow of a giant thorn into view of the river again. A single sharp cry, a sullen splash in the water, laid before him in a moment his position, and he knew that Frank Crevillon's boat was indeed no plaything, but a light and well-built craft which danced a dance of mocking triumph on the water, and dipped her prow into the mimic waves, as though in light laughter at the would-be master she had hung overboard.

"Drowned in the Bay of Naples!" came like a flash of light across the doctor's eyes in that moment. Was it to be the same tale over again? It is a hard thing to save the drowning. It may read easy in books, or to the unpractised heroes who never tried to swim. But the swimmer knows how hard a thing it is; knows, as he takes his spring, that the chance in his favor is only the horsehair holding up the sword. And Dr. Secker was a swimmer; and life is dear to us all. Here, before himself, lay that sudden death which had seemed to him so terrible; a sudden, swift whirl into eternity, with no space for summing up his own short-comings and seeking mercy; no time to do better, or try to do better. And in that second which sufficed for him to throw off his coat, a thousand thoughts danced through his brain, of life and death, of hope and despair; of Amy. Would she know, if he died, how he died? Would she know that these, his last thoughts, were full of her? Would she know how suddenly the old tenderness came rushing in upon him in a great flood; and he read in that moment that he had not given her up,—that she was his one love still, now as ever, and forever?

A confusion of interlacing branches overhead, the light motion of the little boat on the ripples, and then the waters of the Dyke surging into his own ears, Frank's coat within his grasp, and a brief hard battle for life!

CHAPTER VIII.

"ARE YOU SORRY?"

No spray moved in the rugged black branches outside; no robin perched amongst them to sing his good-night song, and bid her cheer up this dull November night. It was growing dusk. A servant came in to draw the curtains and light the candles in the big centre chandelier. Amy turned from the window to the fire, and sat down. A strange presentiment oppressed her of something unusual going on in the house. There had been a sudden confusion, a hasty opening and shutting of doors, and voices raised above their wonted pitch; but she had been ill, and was a prisoner in the drawing-room, whence she did not dare to issue that she might see for herself what was wrong—if, indeed, anything were wrong. She looked at the servant's face, with the idea of asking some question; but the first was dull and expressionless, only absorbed in the lighting of those candles, so she gave it up.

When she was alone again, she looked into the fire and thought. She had been thinking all day; not because her thoughts were pleasant to her, but because they would not let her alone. Was she getting well? She hardly knew. She was not very sure that she wanted to get well. Nobody cared whether she did or not. Of course it was very wrong, and morbid, and foolish to think such thoughts, but it is not always possible to help thinking them. When Dr. Guise looked at her through his spectacles, and pronounced that his prescriptions had done her good, she laughed, but the kind old doctor did not know why. He would say, "That's right: laugh as much as you like; it's better than physic."

But the fact was, that when Joanna as regularly as a certain hour came round, poured out a glass of nectar for Amy, and brought it to her, Amy would look at it and through it, as a connoisseur does at wine, and then she would wait until Joanna's back was turned, and wickedly throw it away. No, Dr. Guise never did her any good before, and she would not take his messes now. If Sir Francis insisted on his coming to see her, why of course he must come. She could not help that. Perhaps Dr. Guise was right enough when he pronounced her malady nothing but nervous depression, and recommended change and individual exertion. Well, she had had change enough; Dykeham was a change now, and she preferred to remain there. As for exertion, there was nothing, so far as she could see, worth exerting herself about.

While she sat by the fire, wondering what she could find to do besides read and think, Joanna came in. Amy just glanced at her, and thought there was something unusual about her face, and then Mrs. Lescar said, "Dr. Secker is here."

She was sorry for having said it when she saw Amy suddenly put her hand to her left side, as she had a habit of doing if anything startled her. But Mrs. Lescar found it difficult to comprehend this extreme facility for being startled.

"Frank fell into the Dyke, and Dr. Secker saw him, and jumped in after him. Frank will be all right, the doctor says; but they have put him into bed, and Lady Crevillon fancies he is feverish, so the doctor has promised to stay here the night. I thought you might like to know."

In all this quietness and matter-of-fact of Joanna's, Amy could not know that for once in her life the placid woman was stirred with an unwonted feeling of emotion. If there was any one she cared for very much in the world it was Frank. She saw in him the future Sir Francis, the head of the house and the maintainer of its good name and standing; he was of consequence in her eyes, over and above which, she had a personal liking for him. Dr. Secker had risked his own life to save Frank's. As the baronet had said, it was a very plucky thing to do; and as Joanna decided, it was more than could have been expected. Some dim idea of justice or atonement, or reward, she hardly knew which, occurred to Joanna as she stood by Frank's bed, looking at the lad's white face, and at his small fingers curling tight round the doctor's hand. She thought of the letter which she had shown to Dr. Secker that sultry August day. It was no harm to show it; Joanna stuck to that; but still she thought she would tell Amy about it, and then it would be off her mind.

"Amy," said Mrs. Lescar, "there was never anything between you and poor Freddy Page, was there?"

Amy looked up from the fire with a spark of sudden, angry light in her eye.

"How dare you ask me, Joanna?"

"I was n't quite sure. He only bored you a little, then. And Lady Crevillon did her best to increase the boredom?"

Amy made a gesture of assent, if, indeed, that could be called assent which was utter indifference, absence of mind, or intolerance of the subject.

"Well, Lady Crevillon hinted that there was something between you. She even said plainly that you liked him, and were unhappy because of a foolish promise which you fancied you ought to keep."

"Well, Joanna?"

"Well, Amy, it was n't probable that I should disbelieve Lady Crevillon,— why should I? Indeed, I thought it the most natural thing in the world that you should like Lord Frederic, and so I still think it would have been. Dr. Secker came here to inquire after you, and I gave him the letter. He is a straightforward, honorable man, for a plain country doctor. He asked if I thought he ought to release you, and I said yes."

"You might have killed me," was all Amy said. And she said it so quietly and low that Joanna had to consider a little before she quite knew what it meant.

"I think Dr. Secker felt it a good deal. I remember that he would walk up and down the room, which is a restlessness that always makes me angry. But it was n't my fault, you know. I acted for the best."

"Is that all you have to say to me now, Joanna?"

"All? Really, I don't know of anything else. I suppose so."

"Then, if you don't mind, I wish you would go away."

Joanna stared a little, but complied. It was very odd. She had been married herself, and had liked Mr. Lescar very well indeed, but then he was in every respect a fit person for her to like. That Amy should have obstinately preferred Carl Secker to Lord Frederic Page was a thing she really could not understand. But it seemed that she had so preferred him. It was a matter of very little or no real consequence to Joanna, but she thought that, so far as she had been concerned in separating them, she would undo her work, and the rest was in their own hands.

"I should n't wonder if they were to make it up again," thought Joanna. "Papa would refuse the doctor nothing now, that's certain."

She went up stairs again, and, sitting down, uncured Frank's fingers from the doctor's hand, and actually kissed them as the boy slept. Dr. Secker saw her do this. A thought, that she had never looked so womanly to him before, came into his mind; and with it something else,— a strange, dawning hope, a sudden, wild light across the gray sky of his life. He could not tell why it came, or whence, but there it was, associated in some strange way with the unusual tenderness of Joanna's manner. She had kissed Frank's hand, but she was looking at him, Carl Secker, and it was some emotion or thought connected with him which had written itself in the softened lines of her face.

"We shall never know how to be thankful enough to you," Lady Crevillon had said to him, wringing his hand. With some such words also the baronet had expressed his gratitude, but this strange woman only sat down and kissed Frank's fingers, with that unaccountable softening of manner towards himself.

"Mrs. Lescar," said Carl, "you have something to say to me. If so, if it is anything about—I suppose I am right in my head—whatever it may be, say it, for God's sake, and don't torture me."

"I have nothing particular to say," responded Joanna; "only I thought you might like to see Amy. She is in the drawing-room. It was all a mistake of Lady Crevillon's about poor Freddy Page."

The doctor heard the words, looking straight down into Joanna's face. Then he turned away from it; there was no longer any softness in it for him. He went out of the room into the lobby, and leaned against the baluster, trying to think. Only a few hours ago he had been dwelling on Amy's sorrow with a pity which he had called a brother's pity. Now, in a moment, all was changed. She had had no great sorrow; had never cared for Lord Frederic; had never, perhaps, forgotten,—what did she think of him? How could he possibly justify that act which seemed now so rash?

But Amy, sitting on by the fire, and looking into it, was no longer conscious of anger against Joanna, Lady Crevillon, or, indeed, any one. One human being had shut them all out; one wavering, doubtful man, walking up and down, fighting with his heart, and giving her up. She knew how he would look as he walked up and down the room. Was it this room? Did he go home at once and write his letter?

And then she thought of the scene at the river side, of men bearing a body, which was Frank's, helpless and senseless, giving no sign by which they might know if he lived. Suppose there had been two instead of one. Suppose—

Then she looked up, and saw Carl coming into the room; saw him come and bend down with one knee on the rug beside her; heard him say, "Amy, forgive"; and then she turned and put her arms round his neck and her face against his cheek. He was come back; he had never meant it. The thing had been as hard for him as it was for her; and now it was all over.

"O Carl, are you sorry? How could you write it? How could you think it? As if anything in that big, noisy world out there could make you less to me! Never doubt me again, Carl."

"My darling—never!"

M. TURGUENIEF'S "LIZA."

THE literature which aims at the delineation of real life is of all orders, ranging from the very frontier of the higher poetry to the very frontier of matter-of-fact chronicle and annals. Between Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield" and Defoe's "Colonel Jack" there is a wider difference of kind than between Goldsmith's "Deserted Village" and his "Vicar of Wakefield," though one of these last is in verse and the other in prose. Between Miss Austen's "Emma" and most of George Eliot's "Scenes from Clerical Life," there is a wider difference of kind than between Tennyson's "Dora" and some of those exquisite prose idylls of George Eliot. And again, Goethe's "Herrmann and Dorothea" approaches more closely in kind this beautiful story of M. Turguenief's than does almost any novel we could name, unless it might be—and that would only approach it at a distance—the exquisite little pseudonymous tale called "A Lost Love" by Ashford Owen, which delighted the world and was forgotten some fifteen years ago. "Liza," written by a Russian author of great genius, and translated by Mr. Balston into English so pure and classical that, unlike almost all translations, it is a pleasure to read it for its style alone, is a story which, without rising quite into the elevated tone of poetry, keeps often so close to its boundary that we hardly know whether we admire it most for the liquid atmosphere of what we may call its sky and cloud,—its treatment of human hope and faith and destiny,—and the transparent sweetness of its pathos, or for the sharp, firm outlines of its delineations of character, and the new world of human life and action which it opens before us. "Liza" is not only a Russian story, but its scenery and conceptions are Russian to the core, and therefore introduce the English reader to a perfectly novel world; and yet the art of the author is of so high a kind, his imagination pierces so completely through the Russian circumstance to the spiritual qualities which are mutually intelligible to each other all the world over, that no one will find the slightest difficulty in entering into the spirit of every page, or will fail to find his imagination enriched by some of the most living groups and the most noble individual characters which have been painted for us since "Romola" was written.

No doubt the texture of the story is slight. M. Turguenief works with few and rapid touches, and elaborates but little. His imagination, perhaps because it is full of poetical depth and lucidity, does not love to assimilate a great mass of material, but seems to give us the essence of his conceptions in delicate but decisive strokes. These two little volumes, minute as they are, contain many chapters of explanatory matter which are not strictly essential to the story, but of the nature of glosses on the text, including excursions of the author's imagination into the antecedents of characters which were already living before our eyes. Yet in spite of these rapid glances back of the author at the formative influences which he supposes necessary to have made the leading characters what he has painted them, and which, interesting as they are, are rather of the nature of imaginative criticisms by the author on his own text, than essential to the movement of his plot and the expression of his actors, the little tale brings before us, as if we had known them all our lives, no less than seven figures all of the most living order, and four of these seven, at least, Liza herself, Liza's great-aunt, Marie Timofeevna, Lemm, the old German physician, and Varvara Pavlovna, Lavretsky's unfaithful wife, characters any one of which would give life and substance to an ordinary novel. We cannot be as sure that the two Russian pedants, Lavretsky, the true man embarrassed by his unnatural education, and Panshine, the hollow official man, are quite of the same calibre, because the truth of these portraits depends much upon circumstantial details, of the nicety and fullness of which we are no competent judges, nor, indeed, judges at all; and the weak, trivial, vain, and sentimental Maria Dmitrievna, though admirably drawn, is hardly a figure of the first rank. But the four characters we have mentioned are sketched with the power of a true poet, and are so independent of the mere local drawing and color through the medium of which, of course, they are delineated, that any one who knows human nature at all recognizes the power and truth of the picture with a thrill of delight.

No doubt the central figure of Liza herself is that which gives its power and pathos to the whole. And when we look back to the few scenes in which her character is painted, we are amazed at the apparently hasty lines and colors of a portraiture which excites a sort of passion of tenderness even in the reader. Statuesque, still, sincere, full of gentleness to all, but always self-possessed till pity deepens into love, dreading with a sort of spiritual fear to throw her heart absolutely into any human passion, and full from the first of a shy, religious ardor which consumes her altogether when once she loses her one hope of earthly joy, Liza seems almost to raise and widen the range of the imagination in the sphere of spiritual womanly beauty. It may rank beside the picture of Dinah in "Adam Bede," though Liza is only a sketch and Dinah a full-length portrait, for truthfulness and spirituality, while in the intensity of poetical loveliness it even surpasses that wonderful and far more elaborate creation. Angels are rarely women. Liza is all woman, yet with a dash of the angel that only a true poet could have given her. The ideal is rarely real. Liza is perfectly real, and yet is the embodiment of that "lyric love, half angel and half bird,

And all a wonder and a wild desire,"

with which Mr. Browning has enchanted our imaginations.

Perhaps the character which strikes us as the second in power and originality to that of Liza is the crabbed old German musician's, Lemm's, — a Rembrandt-like picture of stiff and soured old age lighted up by the belated flame of a true artist's devotion to a rare pupil's purity and sweetness. The picture of Lemm's efforts after a composition that shall delineate in some shadowy way the nature of Liza, of his nervousness as, with compressed lips, he opens out his first attempt on the piano, of its failure owing to the complex, involved, and cramped movement of his thought, and of his despair at that failure, and then later of the success with which he breathes his passion into a single strain of trust and purity in the midnight, is one of the finest episodes we can remember in fiction. The cross, reserved, age-stricken man, with his profound sense of failure, is a figure far from ideal, and yet even when he is at his crabbedest the artist conveys that sense of an inward glow, of unsuccessful genius jarring all his nature, which prepares us for the gleam of fire when it comes.

The irritable, sincere, shrewd old aunt Marfa Timofeevna, with her sharp humor, her keen eye for affectations and falsehoods of all sorts, her dread of religious enthusiasm, and her profound tenderness of nature, is a character of slighter interest, no doubt, than either of those we have mentioned, but not of less living force. The contrast between her somewhat jerky energy of nature and Liza's spiritual stillness of soul is a very happy one, and tends to bring out the higher art in the painting of Liza as much as to relieve it with more commonplace materials. Her sarcastic antipathy to her niece's, Maria Dmitrievna's, sentimentalism is most happily rendered. Altogether, she brightens and vivifies the story which might otherwise be in too much danger of a certain melancholy idealism, — its higher characters, except her own, partaking of the dreamy and contemplative nature.

The character of the unfaithful wife, Varvara Pavlovna, a thoroughly selfish and impure nature of the velvet kind, is drawn with a power hardly excelled even in the picture of her rival Liza. M. Turguenief evidently delights in drawing characters more or less imbued with the artistic temperament. There are three, at least, in this little group, one true artist, and two with the superficial sensitiveness of the temperament, though without a trace of any disinterested love of the ideal. Varvara Pavlovna's soft audacity, her inward laughter and acted tears, the delight in conquest which brings her back to try if she cannot reconquer her alienated husband's heart, for which she does not care, or, at all events, extort a larger allowance from his generosity, — the verve and elasticity of her enjoyment of the rôle of temptress, even with those whom she only wishes to disturb and unsettle, not to win, her mischievous sensualism, the ecstacy of half-bacchanalian rapture with which she dwells on a certain noisy waltz of Strauss, and the utter coldness of heart which does not even permit her to adhere consistently to the part she is assuming, are drawn with a wealth of small touches which is perfectly astonishing, when you consider the few pages devoted to her at all.

We can give no extract from this wonderful little story which will at all do justice to its genius, but we are sure, not only that it cannot disappoint any one with a true feeling for the higher art, but that it will be one of those few books to which its readers will return time after time with new pleasure, as they do to books which teach them more of life than life itself. Of the accuracy of the translation — from the scholar's point of view — we cannot judge at all, as the present writer is wholly ignorant of Russian. But there are in every page phrases which have all the force and sharpness of a great original. To give an example of what we mean, when we are told that Gedeonovsky laughed "a thin and cringing laugh," we feel sure that if that is not both choice and faithful translation, Mr. Ralston must have himself the literary powers of a keen observer and a subtle painter of human life.

SURVIVAL OF INSTINCTS.

It is a popular fallacy, which cannot be too plainly repudiated, that all persons living at the same time are contemporaries. A very slight degree of observation is sufficient to refute the notion. Without speaking of antiquaries and others, who manage to erect dams in the shape of bookcases and study walls for the purpose of artificially arresting a little backwater from the current of time, we need not travel far to find whole populations living in remote ages.

A few hours' journey will take us to the middle ages in the Tyrol, and a day or two further east we come upon regions where time has stood still since the very dawn of modern civilization. There are remote islands where the natives are, properly speaking, contemporaries with the makers of the kitchen-middings, and living, for all practical purposes, in the Bronze or Stone Age. It is more interesting, however, to note how, in one and the same district, time runs at all the different paces described by Rosalind, with persons living side by side. In external appearance they do not differ considerably; but one is really living at the present day, whilst another is a specimen of the primeval savage, or it may be of the Middle Ages, just coated with a thin varnish of the nineteenth century. We are accustomed to quote the proverb about scratching a Russian; but transformations quite as remarkable may be made by subjecting an Englishman to the same operation. It is, for example, a common remark, which has many very interesting applications, that not a few old heathen superstitions, and ceremonies founded upon them, are to be discovered amongst our peasantry at the present day. Various practices at weddings recall the remote time when marriage consisted in the simple and decisive process of carrying off the bride by force. There are ceremonies of a religious character which in all probability were originally observed in honor of pagan deities, and have since taken the superficial dress of the established religions of successive epochs. Few things are more curious than the way in which old creeds, supposed long ago to be dead and buried, and satisfactorily forgotten, every now and then crop up to assert their continued vitality. On the same principle we know that words which were thought to have dropped out of the language still find lurking-places where they survive until some emergency brings them forwards. The use of railways brought out two or three expressive words which had been long hidden away in such profound depths below the ordinary surface of language that it is hard to trace their origin. Even amongst people who pass themselves off very successfully as contemporary mortals we find these curious resurrections of extinct superstitions which suggest that their believers are rather the inhabitants of a past epoch, who by some accident have not heard of their own death, than real living and moving moderns. The spirit-rappers, for example, so far from having invented a brand-new absurdity, are really, as Mr. Tylor has recently pointed out, cases of the survival of primitive modes of thought.

The whole theory which explains the creaking of a table by the intervention of a spirit is precisely the ancient method of feticism. Not only is the method of reasoning the same, but the old applications of it survive. When the Davenport brothers untied knots by the help of supernatural powers, they were only repeating a performance which had been rehearsed in Esquimaux huts and by various savage conjurers. A mode of divination has recently become popular by what is called planchette, — a simple contrivance for enabling a person to write apparently under the influence of bits of wood instead of his own fingers. A method in all respects essentially similar has long been practised by certain Eastern races. It is not so much that there is nothing new under the sun, as that nothing becomes altogether antiquated. A superstition is apparently killed down, but some fragments of it remain, and, like the objectionable weed which has spread through our rivers of late years, suddenly sprouts up again, and astonishes us by its amazing powers of multiplication.

These special instances, which might be indefinitely multiplied, are enough to illustrate a truth which is susceptible of much wider application. The organization of society varies slowly, and we generally complain that reforms in practical matters lag far behind the ideas which they are supposed to embody. But it is equally true that changes take place in many details long before the mass of mankind is at all capable of appreciating the general truths which they exemplify. Persecution had become impracticable long before the principle had been grasped that the State had no business to interfere with the religious beliefs of the individual.

Indeed, at the present moment the principle is so imperfectly understood that, if people did not shrink from the logical consequences of their theories, many clergymen and ladies would obviously derive extreme satisfaction from seeing the argument of physical force once more applied to speculative controversies. Duelling still survives in every European country except England, and its existence implies that a prejudice congenial to certain military or chivalrous instincts has long survived the order of ideas on which it was originally founded. It is quite unnecessary, however, to go outside our beloved island to find plenty of instances of this strange vitality of certain sentiments long after the apparent extirpation of the root from which they originally sprang. What, for example, is the true philosophy of the Muscular Christian? To a certain limited extent he may possibly be an outgrowth from the wants of the time. The increase of towns and the difficulty of obtaining open-air exercise make an increased attention to athletic pursuits not only pardonable but highly desirable. This, however, would be a very inadequate account of the singular species of enthusiasm which began by infesting our schools and universities in spite of the coolness of the authorities, and has ended by carrying away the authorities themselves. The disease in its most characteristic developments is marked by symptoms far exceeding any reasonable tendency to the cultivation of our physical nature. The most desperate cases end in a kind of absorption of the brain by the muscles, and the patient is found to be suffering from a strange hallucination which entirely distorts the true relations of things, and leads him to form a curious ideal of the highest human type, in which all intellectual and moral excellence is regarded merely as a useful condition towards developing his athletic capacities.

There may be various ways of explaining a social phenomenon so singular and so little suited to the general spirit of the times. The simplest supposition is apparently one the nature of which we have already indicated. Some of the prejudices and beliefs which went to make up the creed of the old-fashioned country gentleman of the Squire Western type were still lingering in the atmosphere. Various circumstances, such as the increase of wealth unaccompanied by a corresponding increase of refinement, prepared a favorable ground into which the seeds of contagion might fall. The result was the sudden outbreak of a disease which has hitherto baffled the efforts of all the established physicians, and indeed has been too generally encouraged by them, under the mistaken impression that its symptoms were those of the exuberant health rather than the morbid condition of the patient. We thus witnessed the reappearance in modern society of a type admirably suited, it may be, for a ruder state of things, but singularly unfitted for a time in which it is generally supposed to be admitted that the soul and the intellect are nobler parts of man than his stomach or his muscles.

Following out the same principle we can have no difficulty in discovering numerous cases where the social or political instincts which are concealed by certain superficial arrangements suddenly reveal themselves in their old unmodified condition. We sometimes laugh at Americans, who, with all the advantages of their admirable democratic institutions, show quite as fine a taste for the charms of crowns and coronets as the most sophisticated subject of a bloated aristocracy. The criticism is very fair, but it implies an exaggerated estimate of the rapidity with which new ideas can be imbibed simply from the operation of new institutions, even assuming that the institutions are perfectly successful. The old instinct which makes a native Englishman love a lord has been far too deeply impressed upon his character to be washed out by a few generations under democratic rule. In course of time it may be that new social arrangements will generate corresponding sentiments, but the process is slow and uncertain. In Europe, to take a similar case, it is held in all public speeches and newspaper articles and philosophical works, that the ancient dogma of a divine right of kings has been finally discredited and destroyed. A king, though he may be the object of a reasonable loyalty on his own account, or simply as the visible symbol of patriotic emotions, is no longer considered as belonging to a separate class, and in possession of a special divine commission. His power is intrusted to him, as to other officials, for the good of the people. This is all very well, and nothing can be plainer in theory. But it is obvious that the old notion of royal sanctity has by no means lost its efficacy.

There are a great number of persons now in Europe who manage to support very respectably the character of claimants for a throne, which, without some remnant of the divine-rights theory, would be simply absurd. If a king was truly believed to be no more than any other man, an ex-King would have no more sanctity than an ex-President, and the Queen of Spain excite as little emotion as Mr. Johnson. The fact that there is still a certain degree of loyalty left towards such people proves that the notion of a divine right still lingers in some small classes. But it is perhaps more significant that when a people resolve to start a new dynasty on the genuine constitutional plan, they never think of going beyond the existing royal families. The Spaniards are in terrible perplexity because none of that sacred class can supply a suitable candidate for the place; if they had really ceased to believe in the ancient doctrine, their choice would be practically unlimited, and they might, if they chose, select a ruler by competitive examination, or any other patent scheme of discovering merit. The fact that such a course is always tacitly assumed to be out of the question, proves how strong a flavor of superior sanctity still surrounds crowned heads, long after we have ceased to assert it in words and indeed have most explicitly renounced it.

Mr. Lecky wrote a book to illustrate the proposition that ancient beliefs frequently expire not by the attacks of opponents or because the force of argument is manifestly against them, but by a kind of spontaneous decay when they have become unsuited to the prevailing atmosphere of opinion. Undoubtedly there are many cases which however they may be explained, lend much countenance to the theory. But the inverse case is equally common and remarkable. Beliefs apparently disappear when the logical base upon which they are founded is finally cut away. But, as a rule, they are very slow to die. They retire into remote country districts, or they lurk in the breasts of particular classes. They display themselves, not by any denial of the fundamental principle to which they are opposed but by incidentally modifying the views which men take of subsidiary questions. People generally admit after a certain quantity of argument that two and two make four, but they continue to entertain grave doubts as to the application of the same principle to more complex arithmetical questions. They look at them in the light of their inherited prejudices, and continue to cherish a faint hope that twice six may possibly be thirteen in spite of the cavils raised by obstinate logicians. The progress of knowledge consists as much in getting rid of old prejudices as in learning new truths; and people continue to use the old formulæ in dealing with corollaries when they have learnt to apply the new ones to the primary propositions. And thus, as, according to Mr. Darwin, a horse retains almost invisible stripes because its ancestor was a zebra, we are marked by the traces of old creeds and instincts for centuries after we profess to have abandoned them.

A PROVINCIAL BALL IN FRANCE.

PARIS is a great social sun, around which eighty-eight satellites revolve, by which they are warmed, and from which they reflect their light. Every department has its little imitative capital, where things Parisian are things perfect, absolutely incapable of improvement. The satellites are as obedient to the whims of the greater orb, as are the satellites of Saturn to their controlling planet. Each of these eighty-eight provincial capitals has its imitation of the Tuileries, its little court, and its manners and fashions, imported from the great dictatorial centre. The prefect is a little emperor, the prefecture a Lilliputian Tuileries; and there is in all of them an imitation aristocratic old Faubourg St. Germain, a quarter of the Champs Elysées, petty boulevards, cafés à la Paris, and coteries of society divided into Bourbons, Orleanists, Imperialists, and Sansculottes. Curious is it to see with what proud reverence society in the provinces looks up to society at the Great City, — with what kindly condescension the Great City looks down upon its little worshippers! Madame la Marquise, who has a hotel in the Rue St. Honoré, and deigns to spend a part of the season at the provincial capital, is inevitably the leader of its society; she is the despot of its fashions, her table is a constant example to the gourmands, her manners are studied, her presence in the houses of the provincial aristocracy is an honor descending an heirloom of tradition in the happy family so highly blessed. Even Parisian vices — whose multitude is legionary, and whose character attests at least the inventiveness of the French ennuyé — are diligently copied, so that if you will but convert social Paris to virtue, you will have a regenerated social France. Even the fashion which they have in Paris, which seems a fashion en permanence, of swindling every Englishman and American who goes there with mouth and pockets open and eyes shut, has penetrated to the "primitive" rural towns; and the "simple honest folk" of remote Gironde or sea-girt Finisterre will cheat you as glibly, with as smooth a face, as the blandest glove girl of the Rue de Rivoli.

A day's journey from the metropolis, there stands, close by a superb river, one of those musty old towns which boasts a prefect and a palace, a general and a mayor, and a polyglot population, Paris-worshippers to a man, — perhaps we should say, to a woman, for the ladies of France are the blindest of all devotees, whether of religion or society. A musty, rickety, staggering old town, with streets full of drunken houses three centuries old, tumbling against one another, and eccentric ancient bridges, which, by a long contiguity to the river waves, have themselves become wavy and undulating, not at all safe to cross, yet remaining there because they are old, and the conservative folk won't desecrate them. An old town, nevertheless, which is wide awake to the fashions, and has its "season," its August races, its winter carnival, its periodical official fêtes and balls, like all other French mankind. On the 15th of August its cosey Parthenon-imitated theatre displays a conspicuous loyalty by a "Vive l'Empereur!" emblazoned on its musty façade in laudatory gas, just under the armless and noseless row of Muses which were propped atop there, they say, in the balcyon days of Cardinal Duc de Richelieu.

Here we found ourselves one bright crisp February day, intent on studying quaint manners and customs, curious to observe provincial French society, with plenty of time on our hands, and fortunately some acquaintance among the beau-monde of this capital of "primitives." Antoine, whose acquaintance we had made one night at the Opéra Comique in Paris, where he had kindly helped us out of a squabble with an employé about our seats, which, engaged a week beforehand, we found filled and overflowing by two fat old French dowagers, who had been guilty of "bribery and corruption" to obtain them. Antoine was a native of R—, oscillated constantly between there and Paris, knew every soul in the place, was hand and glove, as well with the "monde de la Prefecture" as with the grumpy old Bourbon aristocracy. He devoted himself to us with that restless enthusiasm which a French host is apt to display on behalf of a foreign visitor. He showed us all the sights, drove us to all the neighboring castle ruins and famous vineyards, procured us admission to private galleries, took a box for us at the theatre, and ordered for us at the principal restaurant a particularly elaborate banquet of dishes du pays. The provincial society, through his exertions, we revelled in to satiety. We saw all the provincial belles of the place, were gauged and ogled by all the matrons with eligible daughters, took dinner here and there en famille, and even penetrated to the gloomy old halls of the provincial Faubourg St. Germain, where we saw the portrait of Louis XVI. hung with crape, and that of Monseigneur the Count of Chambord festooned with the snow-white flag of Bourbon royalty. "Mes amis," said Antoine, one day, after we had "done" everything in the place and its vicinity, "we will go to the Prefect's ball. There you will see our society at its best. It is a quaint country reproduction of Haussman's balls at the Hôtel de Ville. It is as amusing as seeing Hamlet played by a strolling company, after having enjoyed Kean at the Princess's" (Antoine had lived in England). It was just what we wished; so our bustling little friend carried his overflowing politeness to the palace, and eloquently persuaded Monsieur the Prefect to send us cards of invitation. In a day or two the postman brought us two huge square envelopes, in which we found elegantly engraved cards, whose contents ran somewhat after this fashion:—

"The Prefect of the Department of—and Madame de Mont Cervin request the pleasure of the presence of Monsieur—at the Palace of the Prefecture, on the evening of February 17th, at nine o'clock.

"On dansera.

"R S V D"

Baron Haussman's cards themselves are not more neat and sumptuous; everything in the style was à la Paris, even to the sending the invitations a fortnight before the night of the ball.

"You must dress," admonished Antoine, "with quite as much care and elaboration as if you were going to the Tuileries. Monsieur the Prefect is very particular."

It was manifest, on the principal streets of the town, that among the ladyfolk at least the occasion was a great one. There was an immense amount of fluttering of dresses among the glove shops and milliners, the dressmakers and the fancy slipper shops. The fortunate ones could be distinguished from the slighted by the happy or disappointed expressions of the faces. The good dames of the provincial capital were as eager to receive cartes for the Prefect's ball, as are those of Paris to be invitées to the Tuileries and the Hôtel de Ville. The wire-pulling and intrigues set in motion to this end are manifold and original. For here, at the balls of the Prefect, is the great matrimonial mart, whether in province or metropolis. Here it is that the thousand and one "old campaigners" lay their traps for unsuspecting young gentlemen, who have, or promise to come into, fortunes and great propriétés. Here it is that the blooming young demoiselles of France are arrayed in all their glory, where their charms are forced by the keen artifice of the older female heads into their highest possible refulgence. Here are the fortune and title hunters,—the victims and the victors of the great and holy institution of mariages de convenance; you might think yourself in a Turkish market for the sale of Circassian beauties, so freely and minutely are physiognomies and physical forms examined, and so shrewdly are the advantages of this or that young monsieur or mademoiselle weighed and compared. It is with many a dowager, yearning for a son-in-law, the last chance. Her petites demoiselles are getting blasées; every year it is becoming more difficult to conceal the intruding wrinkles, to hide the increasing pinched appearance of the skin, to infuse a forced vivacity and a difficultly acted youthful piquancy into the poor tired maids, hunted to death,—alas! not by men, but by mammas,—in the race after a husband and a permanent place in the great woman-world,—society.

Last summer, at Trouville and Vichy, was a disheartening failure. Monsieur le Comte flirted with Mademoiselle Hortense most desperately—and jilted her. Young Fiquot, the Paris merchant, was amazingly attentive, ever by the side of Louise, took her boating, taught her fishing, got up at dawn to play croquet with her,—and had the insufferable impudence to propose to that red-haired girl from the neighboring village in the very midst of it! These little untoward circumstances may not reach Paris,—the Parisian dowager may forget them, and they may descend to oblivion amid the glitter and rush of Parisian pleasure. But such things reappear like ill-visaged phantoms to the dame of the provincial capital. Gossip, the fastest traveller and veriest Paul Pry there is in the frail human world, wafts every lightest story, every petty intrigue, from the great summer resorts to the country towns where live its victims; and the stories are gloated over with great gusto in the mansions where there are rival demoiselles to be "settled," and to whom every discomfiture of the enemy is as a sweet and pleasant savor. Rival "old campaigner" takes and says that not a colleable of the story shall be lost as it goes the rounds; and even embellishes it, that it may have a readier hearing and a more fatal effect.

The night came, bright and clear, and we, arrayed strictly according to the code ceremonial, were ready promptly at the time appointed. The usually quiet streets were already noisy with the rumbling of carriages and cabs, which seemed to be in an amazing hurry to reach the palace, for what reason we soon learned. The faithful Antoine soon arrived with our own vehicle, and we, too, whirled rapidly on the stony thoroughfares, down long, narrow winding old streets, anon through a pretty little old-fashioned square, along the river quays, until finally we came in sight of the prefecture itself. It was all ablaze with lights; a row of bright gas jets crossed the front of the long, white, tasteful edifice; over the gate was another illumination; while upon the façade there appeared a fiery illustration of the imperial heraldry of Napoleon III. The vehicles were already so many, that the long line of them, awaiting their turns, extended far up the street which led to the prefecture. Within there was truly a very inspiring "sound of revelry by night"; and the figures of the guests, in official paraphernalia and the gaudy hues of the feminine toilet, betrayed themselves through the dazzlingly lighted windows. While exercising the sublime quality of patience, in waiting to reach the door, Antoine was so kind as to give us some lessons regarding the customs of the ball. At last we drove up to the high, wide portal, gave our orders to cocher, and entered. There was a vast vestibule, with apartments on either side: at the upper end, a broad staircase, separating midway, two smaller flights leading right and left. The vestibule and staircase were adorned with high plants, flowers, shrubbery, and festoons leafy and floral. On one side of the vestibule the ladies, and on the other the gentlemen, laid aside hats and cloaks, giving them to some neatly clad bonnes, who ticketed them and put them carefully away in cribs.

When we reached the top of the broad staircase, we were stopped by a man in livery who sat at a little table with a huge book before him, and who, demanding our names, inscribed as we dictated. Then we ascended to the top, and found ourselves in a suite of apartments scarcely less magnificent or sumptuous than the reception-rooms of the Tuilleries itself. We entered the anteroom, in the middle of which was a fanciful and very unique arrangement of plants and flowers, rising in a kind of tasteful pyramid. Here we were confronted by a huge fellow in livery, as straight, bulging, and crusty as possible, who, having taken our names, pompously marched to a high door, and with great dignity shouted them out.

We were indignant, however, to hear each of our names atrociously mangled; especially my friend Jenkins, who started to hear himself announced to the Prefect by something which sounded very like "Monsieur Jackass!" In we walked, and found ourselves opposite a very sleek-looking, closely shaved, gaudily dressed gentleman, — no less a person than Monsieur the Prefect. He was standing; and by his side, on a satin fauteuil, sat Madame la Préfète, a stately mass of perplexing circumambient lace and ribbons, with jewels winking at you from all over her head and arms, and a perfectly Parisian society smile of welcome. Monsieur was dressed in a blue coat, three fourths hidden in broad eccentric silver lace, and was the very picture of a prosperous and not ill-natured official of consequence.

Our devoirs to host and hostess performed, we passed on into the dancing saloon, a long, superbly garnished apartment, with musicians laboring frantically over their brass and catgut at the upper end. The chandeliers were supplied with innumerable wax candles, it being plebeian in France to use gas outside the kitchen and entries. Life-size portraits of Napoleon III. and Eugénie graced the walls, "Donnée par S. M. l'Empereur," as the panels were careful to tell you; the walls were richly gilded and corniced, adorned, not as the wealthy edifices of England are, with heavy oaken panelings and ceilings, but in that lighter and more gaudy style which, universal in French houses, is so typical of the national character itself.

The room was already crowded to suffocation, albeit it was but a few minutes past the invitation hour; the dancers could hardly move through their figures, and mademoiselle's attempts to glide gracefully and fascinatingly through the "ladies' chain" were painfully balked by her bumping against some one at every curve. It was a curious sight, this ball-room in the provinces.

On the two long sides of the saloon were two rows of seats, one in front of the other, those against the wall being raised fauteuils, rising above the chairs in front. On this back row of raised fauteuils sat in all their majesty the aristocratic and wealthy dowagers of R—. So haughty and starched did they look, with their satin-lined opera-cloaks, their bejewelled eyeglasses, their gray hair arranged à la mode, and their rich lace caps disposed with matronly dignity, that they reminded one of the senate scene in Othello, and seemed a bench of stern feminine judges, considering the pros and cons of holy matrimony. There they sat, the long line of shrewd old schemers, deeply intent on their game, acting the Gorgon to one young man and the would-be mother-in-law to another, according to circumstances. On the seat below each sat her blooming (natural and artificial) daughter or daughters, watched over by mamma with too-anxious care, exhibited in the matrimonial mart, and looking each her sweetest and modestest with all her little might.

Now the reason why the carriages had been in such haste to reach the prefecture was clear. The old dowagers were running a race for the best seats. Just as the ambitious gardener or fruiterer will strain every nerve to secure the most prominent and accessible stall in the market where to display his carefully prepared and tastefully arranged stock, so did these "old campaigners" of the province have their carriages at the door exactly at the stated moment, calculate to the nicety of a second how to arrive at the prefecture just long enough before the hour of invitation to enter the saloons as the clock strikes, and to lose no time in appropriating the most eligible seats for self and daughters, those most eligible seats being the ones most conspicuous and easiest of approach for messieurs les messieurs. This great point gained, — and everybody knows how important it is for a general, military or social, male or female, to have the choice of his ground, — madame would enthrone herself aloft, and her daughters would take the seats below her; and mamma would fix a ribbon here and a curl there, stooping from her eminence for the purpose, and would then lean back, and with her eyeglass take a deliberate survey of the general effect with an exhaustive coup d'œil.

Thus the ladies, old and young, ensconced in a double row of seats, extending on either side the length of the room. The gentlemen are grouped together in a thick kaleidoscopic bunch near the door, kaleidoscopic because of the variety and gorgeousness of their apparel. They are absorbed in diligently ogling the double line of fair ones, in making out a mental list of partners, remarking to each other things complimentary and otherwise of the dear ladies, one saying, "Mon Dieu! how lovely Mademoiselle D—— is to-night!" another, "Madame R—— is more artistic than ever this evening; she has changed her coiffeur"; her cheeks are of a more delicate rose than usual"; another, "There's that old Gorgon la Baronne de la F——! Mademoiselle might make a catch, had she not always that ugly old witch by her to petrify one," and so on. The orchestra strikes up and the bunch of the sterner sex breaks up and spreads along the row of seats, carte des dances in hand. Every gentleman has the right to ask any lady whom he chooses to dance, whether he knows her or not. Introductions are not comme il faut. The prudent man, however, he who is well versed in the manners of society, will first take the precaution to conciliate madame by asking her permission to ask mademoiselle for her hand in the next quadrille. Madame runs her eye rapidly over him, glances keenly at his face, and then, if the scrutiny is satisfactory, grants his petition. Ten to one she knows all about him, though his eyes may never have rested on her before; is well up in his antecedents; knows his fortune within a thousand; and could tell him off-hand who his great-grandfather was. As he takes his place on the floor with mademoiselle, Madame Gorgon keeps a never-wavering watch upon the couple. Every smile he gives her, every time he keeps a lingering grasp on her hand at the conclusion of a figure, every glance of one or other which may betray a growing fancy or be the accompaniment of a delicate compliment, all is noted by the "old campaigner," who sits and calculates, and hopes for a happy dénouement and marriage bells. If she is pleased with monsieur, he may safely linger by his partner's side after she has resumed her seat, and then madame listens with vast content to his gracefully murmured speeches, and builds her châteaux en Espagne higher and more beautiful than ever. Still, she never suffers them from her sight. If monsieur invites mademoiselle to take refreshment, he must include madame also, and he presses through the throng with mamma and daughter on either arm. Nor will he dare to ask to be permitted to call on mademoiselle on the day succeeding the ball, to inquire after her health after so much excitement. His only chance to speak with her is at the ball itself. Even if he is really smitten, the charming tête-à-tête of a lover are denied him: he must hie him to a notary, and send him as ambassador to plead for him at the paternal hearthstone. So is the fashion regarding courtship and marriage in provincial France.

But the flirtations of the evening are not confined to bachelor messieurs and unprovided-for mademoiselles. For instance, Madame and Monsieur de L—— go to the ball simply and purely to get rid of each other. They are the natural result of mariages de convenance; they were married because he had a de to his name and a château in Normandy, and because she brought a dot of a hundred thousand francs a year. They don't hate or love each other, but each of them, after his or her fashion, loves somebody else. So madame and monsieur come to the ball and separate at the door; madame is in one corner of the room, listening to the flattery of her dear friend Marie's faithless spouse; monsieur is in the opposite corner, bending over the young lady who was married last month, and whose husband in his turn has gone to Paris to flirt with somebody else.

Husband and wife keep apart the whole evening; see each other's attentions elsewhere bestowed with the sublimest indifference; enjoy a delightful evening, and ride home, sitting as far apart from each other as possible in the carriage, and never utter a word from one end of the ride to the other. They are just the people to tell you that marrying for love is ridiculous twaddle, yet, think you, are they really happy? While the couples are dancing and the married folk are flirting, pass we through the brilliant saloon to a smaller apartment opening out of it, and we find ourselves in the refreshment-room.

Here mostly the "old buffers" congregate and are stationary, for their chief pleasure at the ball is eating and drinking. Generals with their gold lace, epaulets, and broad breasts, a perfect firmament of stars and orders; the mayor, pompous and bedizened with an outrageously gaudy official costume, army officers and navy officers, sub-prefects and secretaries, foreign consuls and judges, are standing about in little knots, talking politics and the prospects of war, the last judicial scandal and the crops, meanwhile sipping Sillery and nibbling at the little fancy-shaped cakes and the marrons glacés peculiar to the art of the French patissier. We like the plan of giving the refreshments: it is to have a broad buffet at one end of the room, with a large table or counter, behind which stand liveried garçons to serve whomsoever is gastronomically inclined to whatsoever takes their fancy for the moment. The table itself is garnished with pyramids of fruit, fresh or conserved; with plates of sandwiches, hot rolls, and fancy cakes; with piles of oranges and grapes, and unique arrangements of symbolical candy. The wines, coffee, chocolate, ice-creams, and sherbets are served as they are called for, in their hottest or coldest state, as the article is: trays are constantly appearing with steaming negus and ponch, as the garçon announces with a stately roll of voice; champagne-bottles are popping right and left, and are emptied fast as little shoals of eager guests crowd up to receive a small share of the bubbling and fizzing nectar, while the more staid sherry and Chablis, St. Julien and madère are quietly passed around in small glasses at the further end.

After the quadrille is over, the heated dancers crowd up to the buffet; panting and fair young demoiselles, as well as rubicund old dowagers, swallow glass after glass of punch and Carte blanche without so much as a wink. Then they rush out again, somewhat more than refreshed, and leave the land clear once more to what we may, not disrespectfully, term the "steady" eaters and drinkers. Some there are, of not very high estate, who have succeeded in obtaining invitations to the ball by one stratagem and another, to whom the Prefect's buffet is an annual feast, replete with delicacies quite unknown to them in every-day life. Such are clerks, and now and then a poor little Jew, or a half-famished medical student. These divide with the pompous old dignitaries above mentioned the permanent guardianship and privileges of the buffet: their hearts sink as the heated dancers pour in, and revive again as they tide out to resume their places on the floor. Meanwhile the resources of the buffet seem exhaustless; it continues to dispense unlimited wines, liquors, rolls, and what not, until, in the early hours, the company has gradually left silence reigning in the gorgeous halls.

There is another room, leading out of the dancing saloon, where something of interest, by the faces of which we catch a glimpse there, seems to be going on. It is a snug little room, richly furnished, and especially provided with a number of small tables. We enter, and find it to be devoted to the exciting pastime of gambling. An innocent-looking young demoiselle glances in at the door, sees what is proceeding, smiles a pretty, not at all disapproving smile, and passes gayly on. There is flagrant, open vice at a fashionable ball, and innocent youth sees it, not blushing with shame, but greeting it with a smile! Such is society in provincial France, and such the example the elders give the rising generation. Even Monsieur the Curé is there, the physician of souls and the Heaven-consecrated castigator of evil manners, bending over the table, his pious eyes lit up with the keen, anxious glare of the spirit of gaming itself.

The Prefect and his lady having passed round to greet their guests in person, this was the signal for the breaking up of the ball. Soon the carriages began to whirl, and the quiet old town once more re-echoed to the clattering of the horses and the tramp of the guests who preferred to return home on foot. The dowagers were, some, doubtless, content with the night's operations, and others, with a little doubt, mortified by one more failure. Mademoiselle put away her silks and laces for the next party, and for an interval the town resumed its wonted sleepiness and monotony. It was one more picture — this ball — of human society in these modern days; and it suggested reveries and comparisons between the new France and the old France of the Bourbon era. And we came away, not regretting that our own lot was cast among the less vivacious, but far more healthy customs of our Anglo-Saxon race.

FAMILIAR QUOTATIONS.*

DR. JOHNSON has told us something about the toil and trouble which are the necessary lot of the makers of dictionaries; and on the title-page of his Lexicon Facciolati has inscribed the words, "Expertus discas quam gravis iste labor." But, undeterred by either warning voice, Mr. Bartlett has compiled and published a collection of "Familiar Quotations" which might very fairly claim for itself the name of a dictionary or cyclopædia, so exhaustive is it of its subject. It differs, indeed, from most other books of quotations that we have seen in respect of its arrangement, which is based, not on the subjects treated of, but on the chronology of the authors whose works have been laid under contribution in its pages. Mr. Bartlett has limited himself to English authors, it is true, — a fact which, we think, he might easily have made clear, and ought to have made clear, in the title of his work; for it is just conceivable that many persons might purchase it in the hope of finding in it a notice of those stock quotations from Virgil and Horace which are even now so "familiar" to readers of the debates as not to have lost their right to be regarded as strictly "phrases in common use" within Her Majesty's dominions.

Mr. Bartlett commences the catalogue of authors upon whom he has drawn with Chaucer; and his list of writers anterior to Shakespeare includes Thomas à Kempis, Rabelais, Tom Tusser, Coke, Cervantes, Spenser, Raleigh, Sidney, Marlowe, and Richard Hooker. We need scarcely say that as he sails down the stream of time after Shakespeare he enriches his pages with many of the gems of brilliant thought and happy expression which are scattered up and down through the writings of Bacon, Donne, Ben Jonson, Bishop Hall, Beaumont, Massinger, Fletcher, George Herbert, Selden, Isaac Walton, Herrick, Shirley, Lovelace, Crashaw, Cowley, and Waller, all anterior in birth to John Milton. And Mr. Bartlett has here given us a well-timed reminder of the extent to which we Englishmen — and may we not say the world? — are indebted for the best and the wisest thoughts that have come down to us to those two great authors whose names we have used as landmarks, those men not of one age or of one country; for out of the first one hundred and twenty-four pages of his book Shakespeare occupies no less than seventy pages, and Milton twenty-four, while from the tuneless and sprightly and right quotable Robert Herrick he contents himself with giving us scarcely a page and a half, and the conceits of terse, epigrammatic George Herbert are dismissed in a single page. We have not, however, looked in vain for a single "familiar" quotation from his works, except for that stanza so acceptable to the advocates of temperance: —

"Drink not the third glass, which thou canst not tame
When once it is within thee, but before
Mayst rule it as thou list; and thou the shame
Which it would pour on thee upon the floor.
It is most just to pour that on the ground
Which would throw me there if I kept the round."

Samuel Butler, as might be expected from the author of Hudibras, brings a large supply of wit and practical sense for quotation, as also do Dryden, Swift, Addison, and Pope. Strange as it may sound, however, Sir Richard Steele supplies but a single paragraph, and Sir Robert Walpole but three. Sir Samuel Tuke, too, puts in his appearance with a single quotation, though it must be allowed to be one of all but universal application: —

"He is a fool who thinks, by force or skill,
To turn the current of a woman's will."

Edward Young, the author of Night Thoughts, is far more prolific of good and quotable matter, and accordingly we have from his pen four pages of terse and pointed sayings, none of which are at all superfluous. Pope, however, as the poet of society and of literature, is laid under contribution to a far larger extent than any other poet or writer of his time, eighteen pages being allotted to those pointed couplets and single lines in which he showed such a masterly power of epigram. Three pages after this strike us as rather scanty measure for the sayings, of Dr. Johnson, grave and gay, in prose and in poetry, and we venture to think that in a future edition both Boswell's Life of Johnson and Johnsoniana might be made to furnish a more copious supply of such fare. If we may take the number of pages which Mr. Bartlett devotes to each writer as an approximate standard of the extent to which the English language is indebted to him for additions to the ever-accumulating stores of wit and wisdom that are treasured in our literary garners, the five pages which he devotes to the poet Gray would lead us to infer that the author of the Elegy in a Country Churchyard had exercised a far wider and more lasting influence on English literature than we could have imagined to be the case. It is not to be wondered at that a writer so essentially popular and dealing so extensively with the minutiae of English life, and especially of country life, as Oliver Goldsmith, should furnish even a larger supply of familiar quotations than the polished and sententious and philosophic Burke, and that The Traveller and The Deserted Village should be more generally quotable than Reflections on the French Revolution. What we have said of Goldsmith applies equally to William Cowper, to whom six pages are devoted, mainly taken from The Task, — that poem which so few, we fancy, would care to read through and yet which is so rich in individual passages of beauty and truth. The same can scarcely be said of Crabbe, who is dismissed with only half a page; but then Crabbe, while he photographed the details of life with exactness, was no philosopher, or, at all events, never rose above the level of the abnormis sapiens of our old friend Horace. Burns, however, fares sufficiently well at the hands of Mr. Bartlett to insure popularity for his book in the Land o' Cakes.

Passing on to the departed writers of our own time, or, at all events, those whom our elder readers can remember, we find George Colman, Robert Hall, Samuel Rogers, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Charles Lamb, James Montgomery, Sir Walter Scott, Byron, Campbell, Tom Moore, Leigh Hunt, Shelley, Keats, Milman, Præd, Talfourd, Tom Hood, Brougham, Macaulay, and Keble, all more or less adequately represented. We notice in the head line of the quotations from John Keble an absurd error, we mean in the date of his death, which was not 1821 but 1866. Among living authors, as may easily be supposed, the first places are given to Tennyson and Longfellow; Mr. Henry Taylor, Lord Lytton, and Barry Cornwall also put in their appearances. One single quotation, however, is all that Mr. Bartlett vouchsafes us from Eliza Cook, and neither Robert Browning nor his accomplished wife, the late Elizabeth Barrett Browning, nor the late Miss Adelaide Procter, are allowed to contribute a single dish to our intellectual repast. "Conspicuous," too, "by his absence," is that modern "master of sentences," the author of Proverbial Philosophy. Surely this is a mistake.

Mr. Bartlett tells us on his title-page that he has not only gleaned largely in the field of literature, but has also endeavored to "trace to their source" the passages and phrases in common use which he puts before us in his pages as "old friends." He has done this in the foot-notes, very satisfactorily as far as he has gone, if not very exhaustively. But why, adopting in the rest of his work the chronological order, has he placed the Old and New Testaments at the end, instead of at the head of those authors from whose mines he has quarried his materials? This, we must fairly own, is a matter which passes our comprehension.

It should be added, in our own justification, that when we called this book a "dictionary" or "cyclopædia" in its way, we dwelt mainly on the fact that it is provided with an ample and elaborate index, without which, indeed, it would be a rudis indigestaque moles of matter valuable in itself, yet valueless for all practical purposes. Mr. Bartlett index occupies exactly a third of the entire volume some idea may be formed of its completeness and its utility.

THE OLDEST OF WATERING-PLACES.

AT a little rustic station called Pepinster in the heart of the rich country about Liège the long Belgian express train halts, and casts forth a number of travellers who have generally a festive air. The eyes of their work-a-day fellow-travellers follow them, as they cross over to another train, ready waiting, and which, from its omnibus-looking carriages, with airy seats on the top, has quite a holiday air also. Tempting too are the rich hills that rise all around Pepinster, — green, massively embroidered with trees, and disclosing a sort of opening into delicious looking valleys; with a peep of a little railway path winding away into their fastnesses.

To follow that track is to have a most picturesque walk. Never did iron-road wind and twist and twirl so gracefully all the while creeping along at the foot of the richly covered hills which slope down to it, yet ever ascending steeply and painfully, now plunging round corners, into a new dell, now running beside a narrow brook, and now beside a delicious valley road until it gets over many miles and reaches the little town it is bound for. Under such conditions an iron-road loses all its grim practical air; and those who wander among the hills that overhang this pleasant valley look down and watch the heavy train winding below among the leaves, toiling and gasping slowly up what was one of the steepest lines on the continent before Mr. Fell began to scale the Alpine passes.

After this picturesque introduction the traveller finds himself at Spa, — the most ancient and courtly of the "Waters." Compared with it, all the rest seem mere "shoddy," — vulgar parvenus who, by dint of gaudy show jewelry, watch-chains, &c., try and make a show. Homburg and its Brunnen are flashy and but of yesterday; they are as mushroom-like as the merchant's wife, who wants, by "a splash," to force herself into good society; but, centuries ago, kings and courtiers came posting across Europe to the "little town in the Valley," and elderly gentlemen of Louis the Great's court, in flowing wigs and velvet coats, stood round "the Pouhon," striving to repair their shrunken persons with the iron waters. As we stroll down the walks of Spa with their quaint names, — such as "the Seven-o'clock Walk," — each marked out with stiff rows of tall trees, and look down their aisle-like perspective, we instinctively repeople them with stately gallants, hoops, and trains.

Spa is like a toy town, such as one would buy in a box at Christmas for little Tommy, to be set up in arbitrary angles, with houses turned every way. A walk of two minutes sets us far above it; with all the roofs clustered below, the tiny streets straggling every way, — the town lies at our feet, sunk in hollow, like a favored toy-terrier buried in a soft, green cushion. Tiny brown ribbons of walks wind up innumerable hills. Exactly vis-à-vis to the church, and bearding it insolently, is a heavy yellow building, where the gaming goes on, called by the ancient name of the "Redoute," and which is entered, not from the gardens, but from the street. In the common street, too, at a corner, is the Well or Pump, under a rather shabby portico. All the houses about have a "sign" — another worn relic.

—the “Arms of Austria,” the “Great King,” and the “Hotel of Spain,” and such names. Every now and again there clatter by the close, round, compact little horses of the place, cob-like in shape, iron-gray or brindled, full of good blood, amazingly sure of foot, and which, driven up steep, paved hills, by the uncouth and cruel French and Belgians, au grand galop, will go till they drop. These “bidets de Spa,” as they are called, come from the forest, and are picturesque, gamesome, friendly little creatures, though it is surprising their honest backs are not strained out of shape by the jolting of hulking Frenchmen, who know not how to ride.

A century ago the traveller who started from Liège had to suffer all the agonies of jolting and shaking over some of the most wretched roads in the world, which descended into the little bowl where the town lay. As the season drew on, these wild traverses, often injured or blocked up by torrents bursting from the mountains, became crowded with the post-carriages of the sick and the great; and of an evening, when the sound of wheels was heard descending the hill, scouts came running on before to give notice, while the idle inhabitants gathered to see the new guest arrive. For the more illustrious visitors cannon were let off from the top of a hill. The carriage pulled up in a little Square, — not bigger than a court, — where the small houses of the place were grouped, and at one side of which was a small hut in a sunken cell, the Well, — the Pouhon, — the glory and support of the town. The traveller, if he was a mere traveller, was jolted to one of the inns, — either to the “Arms of England,” the “Court of London,” or to the “Crown of Thorns.” There he was sure to be entertained, but would be roused betimes by a din and chatter under his windows. On looking out he would see the quaintest scene. Not five o’clock, and yet every one astir! The little place below filled with figures, all in a sort of négligé morning-dress, — wigs and bags and sack backs, — bowing, bending, posturing, and ogling. At the outskirts waited carriages and horses. Every one was promenading over the rude curb-stones, as if it was an alley in Versailles. The stranger would notice that all, ladies as well as gentlemen, carried a gay crutch or stick, the handle of which was painted elegantly; and had, hanging from the waist or button-hole, a little variegated dial; as each visitor quaffed his tumbler, he moved on the hand, to record the number he had taken. These little toy dials, as well as the canes, were a specialty of the place, decorated by the native artists. Every one, too, carried little bon-bon boxes, holding candied fruit or orange-peel, to take away the sharp taste of the waters; and these toys, again, were adorned with devices and Cupids, and made as attractive as possible. The pleasant crowd, thus early astir, was composed of the most curious elements, — chevaliers, barons, lords, ladies. After their tumblers the bulk of the company found their way to the pleasant broad alley, where they could promenade, while others took carriages and horses and drove out to the Sauvenière and other springs, a mile or two up the hills.

The quality, however, did not put up at such houses as the “Arms of England” or the “Crown of Thorns.” Princes and other great personages would come with a great suite, and hire a whole hotel or mansion, handsomely furnished, bringing their own cooks and retainers, and would there keep a handsome table and see abundance of company. For such guests there were the “Hotel de Lorraine” and the “Cornet,” both in the High Street, and both provided with rich tapestries; and to these houses came the Prince Bishop of Liège and his Serene Highness the Prince Bishop of Augsburg, and the Elector of Cologne. Some families were content, as at present, with simple lodgings. But the favorite mode of life was the inn table-d’hôte, which was looked on as a pleasant system of introduction and a gay passport to new acquaintances.

Even so far back as a hundred and twenty years ago, the little Kur-list, “Fremden Blatt,” the delight of the vacant mind at such places, was in every one’s hand; and a spirited bookseller came over from Liège to print and sell it. He also kept a library, the modest subscription to which was a single crown for the season. Till noon dressing was not thought of. Breakfast and consultation with the physician took up a great deal of time. Almost the first visit the stranger received — like Mr. Sterne at Desseins — was that of two friars; but they received far more courteous reception than the sentimental traveller was inclined to offer; and it was the fashion to present the fathers with a substantial contribution. Another visit was that of the barber, who was to come regularly every morning “to shave you and dress your wig.” Then the physicians made their call, — gentlemen, who, by the description of their manner and proceeding, seem only to have anticipated modern practitioners of the same pattern, — the English Dr. C — and the native Dr. L —. The same providential coincidence that the waters exactly suited the complaint of every one who chanced to come there, seemed to obtain then as now.

Every one laid himself out for gayety and amusement, and determined to cultivate both his health and his spirits. It was a special custom to call on every new arrival of rank. Thus cards were perpetually sent round, and as perpetually returned, and new acquaintances were formed. This custom was introduced in the year 1759, by a reformer, Count de P —, who had the boldness to go round in his chariot and pay his respects to every member of the beau-monde; and his example was speedily followed. The newly arrived stranger would be inclined to dress himself in strict tenue for this ceremonial, and get on his sword; but he would be told, to his surprise, that by common consent no one ever appeared with a sword, save on the first and the last day of his stay, — the prudent reason being, that in this little “olla podrida” of adventurous intriguers and chevaliers who belonged to all classes and all nations, quarrels and disputes were but too certain to arise, and a sword would be only too tempting and convenient an arbitrator.

Dinner seems to have been about two o’clock, and after dinner most of the “Bobelins” would indulge in a nap. About five o’clock the assembly room opens, or the private parties begin; and the pretty Seven-o’clock Walk — so called because the sun plays upon it and makes walking there impossible until that hour — fills up with a gay crowd. This walk is a very beautiful and fine plot of ground, considered in itself; on each side there are divers little flowery meadows, which, with their verdure, strike the eye in the most agreeable manner. When the crowd of silken coats and rich dresses were seen filling up this picturesque “mall” of a summer’s evening, the effect must have been charming. There every new visitor came to see the whole company of the place, as it were, in a focus; every tongue could be heard, but the most predominant was French, and next to French, English. To the English, indeed,—great travellers in the last century,—Spa owes much. The prettiest walks trace their origin to generous visitors from that country.

The assembly room was in the "High Street," close to the Pouhon, and must have been on the very spot where the present more ambitious Temple stands. There cards, draughts, and other games are played, as well as the favorite gambling game of faro. There was no "privilege" however, then, or monopoly; and at the coffee-houses—especially at one close to the "Court of London"—high play went on at all hours. Some players staked crowns, others nothing but gold. At the tables were to be seen the professional gambler and the dilettanti, who played merely to amuse themselves. The scene, too, is much the same as it is nowadays, and there is the same study of character. "The curious observe some of those who game extravagantly high to look pale, dejected, incensed to the last degree, and, in an agony of despair, ready to devour their cards." But there was also to be noticed, what was a feature of this unlicensed gambling,—“the gamesters, who make a trade of play, with a share in the bank, but who appear to be punters only, and seldom fail at squeezing novices or dupes.” Five o'clock was the hour for a ball. Gentlemen pay “four escalins” for admittance, but may introduce any number of ladies. Cards and faro go on in little side-rooms, and in a little summer-house in the gardens. The dancing is always kept up with great vivacity, the ball opening with a minuet or two, which gives way to the favorite measure of the night,—the English country dances. These are performed with extraordinary vigor, owing, no doubt, to the English element; and there are instances of some fatal results from over-heating. The wonderful English, indeed, when on their “grand tour,” always distinguished themselves in this way; and about this time a dancing royal prince of this nation actually killed himself at Monaco from his excessive exertions at a ball.

Sometimes a company of strolling comedians would arrive, and fit up a theatre at “a shocking place called the Gray Mare Inn.” But a regular theatre was soon built on the site of the White Rose Hotel. Everything, however, was over by seven o'clock,—a true invalid's hour,—and supper was then thought of, which was, indeed, no more than a little fruit, or something as light as eggs and spinach, bon vivants sometimes indulging in a pigeon or a chicken. Nothing could have been pleasanter than the endless junketings and parties of pleasure that went forward, all for the now exploded aim of promoting esprit, railery, and a little gallantry. Every young gentleman was to be “ingenious,” or to show himself a “youth of parts.” Every one was expected to contribute gayety and repartee. These arts of society were then seriously cultivated; they constituted the great “passe temps,” and it may be questioned whether our modern society, which requires material objects to amuse itself with,—balls, picnics, dinner-parties, in all of which there is no premium upon wit or “parts,” but a large one upon riches and estates,—has not lost by the change. The Spa company were eternally casting about for variety and lively chat. The town was a republic of gayety, and the man who could be lively and “pass the time” was more welcome than the wealthy noble. Those old trees which abound everywhere in this sylvan spot, had they tongues, could make the strangest revelations; they could tell of the endless expeditions in the little calashes,—vehicles without either doors or windows,—which took ladies and gentlemen out to the springs for some fifteen pence. A calash was to be had for the whole morning for half a crown. The sides were open, with leathern curtains, so that the country could be seen on both sides. The driver usually walked at the head of the horse; and there were only three hackney-coaches of the official sort in the place.

The associations of the curious little place are so dramatic,—so strange and compact, as it were,—that it is not difficult as we walk to people the hills and lanes and twisted streets with quite a procession of remarkable personages.

Even the little shields and scrolls still fixed over many archways—the “Hotels of Spain,” “of England,” of the “Crown of Austria,”—old-fashioned modes of compliment—call up the images of many an august lodger. So lately as a hundred years ago, the stranger walking along would be attracted by the shield of Marguerite of Navarre, with that of the Duchess of Montpensier, and other ladies who attended her at Spa. Farther on was to be seen the shield of the great general Alexander of Parma, of the King of Poland, and of many more. But when old houses were being pulled down and rebuilt, the stupid Flemings did not care to reinsert these memorials, and they were collected together at a sort of museum. Just at the corner of the tiny place opposite the Pouhon, where the “Wolf” inn stood, could be seen a whole emblemmat of these relics; and the English Bobelin would be interested in seeing that of the exile Charles II.

For whole centuries those rude mountain roads and defiles were traversed by illustrious guests. It is curious to think that the little Spa should have been lucky enough to have preserved its monopoly so long. So far back as the sixteenth century, the current began to flow, and the illustrious muster-roll of guests starts with the physician of Henry VIII., Augustini, in 1545; with the Duke de Nevers, and the Jesuit, Maldonatus. Marguerite of Navarre set off, but from the badness of the roads, could get no farther than Liège, where she was quite content to remain, and where for six weeks the palace of the Prince Bishop was the scene of the most gorgeous festivals. The tradition of the place runs, that Henry III. had been ordered here by his physicians, and had put up at the sign of the “Grande Monarque.” But not much faith is to be placed in this royal visit.

Later, it is known that Mary of Medicis and the queen of Louis XIV. graciously deigned to drink bottled Spa waters at Paris,—a compliment carefully recorded and handed down by the gratified townspeople. Then Alexander of Parma came no less than three times; and on one occasion was sumptuously entertained at the old castle of Franchimont, whose ruins the tourist now makes up a party to visit. In the same century came the wonderful scholar Lipsius, whose Latin letters are really amusing; and who, for one of those old mouldy men of learning, had a surprising deal of the pleasantness of life in him, and whose account of his three dogs is very gracious and graphic.

It is remembered, too, with some gratitude, that it is the English who have "made" Spa, and who, during its most flourishing times, poured into it in streams, and often constituted the majority of the visitors. They soon brought over a club with them from their own country, — a national institution of their own, — which was held at the house known as the "Prince de Ligne," and whose influence soon became paramount. The most important of English visitors was Charles II., who, wandering about, before he came to the throne, found his way most characteristically to this sea of pleasure. The day of his arrival is recorded, — the 20th July, 1654, — and he was attended by his sister and a retinue of noble exiles. He remained a whole month. In the same century came Saumaise, the great Protestant commentator, who also paid it a second visit in the train of no less important personages than Queen Christina of Sweden, and her unlucky squire follower, Monaldeschi. He came a third time, and died there, with a joke on his lips, — "Je m'en vais de Spa." St. Evremont came later.

But the great visit was now at hand, and the most remarkable of its guests was to come and make the glory of the little place. This tiny place is the shrine of the Czar Peter. Over the spot where the Pouchon bubbles up, the large porch displays the conspicuous legend, — and affixed to the wall is a tablet with a self-glorifying inscription; and at the top of the steps, looking straight down into the well, is a bust of green bronze with another inscription. The fourteen or fifteen thousand visitors of each season are, "bon gré, malgré," reminded, with every glass they quaff or every stroll they take, that this great man belongs in some sort to the town.

The story of his visit is most graphic and amusing, and besides so local as not to be at all familiar to the general reader. The Czar was about forty-five years old, and his health was utterly broken down by excesses and hard living. His struggles with Charles XII. and the fatigues of war had told on him. His life was endangered, and he looked an old man. It was proposed that he should drink the waters bottled; but it is characteristic of the man that, ill as he was, he resolved to face the trials of the journey, and take the roughest, if not the readiest, road to health. He had loss of appetite, his stomach was quite relaxed, his face was ghastly pale, his legs all swelled, and he was, besides, seized periodically with violent bilious spasms. In this desperate condition he arrived at Spa, as at a hospital, in June, 1717, and remained six weeks. His barbarous habits astonished even the passive natives, accustomed to all sorts of eccentricity, and surprised at no extravagance in their visitors. His fashion of taking the waters had something savage in it. He drank of all the fountains indiscriminately; but, as he took the trouble to go every day to the Geronstère, some two miles away, the obsequious gratitude of the natives was pleased to attach to that fountain — perhaps arbitrarily — the honor of restoring his Majesty to health. He had his own physician, Areschin, — an Italian it may be presumed, — but he despised all prescriptions, and got well in his own barbarous, brutal fashion. He would take over twenty tumblers of the water in a morning. All the while he laughed at the restraint of the regimen, drank wines to excess, ate after his own wild manner, indulged in orgies, and yet worked out his cure in defiance of these irregularities.

A canon, who was sent with congratulations by the Prince Bishop of Liège, has left a portrait of this strange prince that Voltaire would have been glad to have. "It must be confessed," says the canon, naively and also sarcastically, "that this prince, or rather Muscovite, is most singular. Count d'Argenteau will have plenty of odd things to tell his excellency the bishop; but he only dined with the Czar on feast-days, while I eat with him in private, and saw his habits. I found him in a tent. I offered him a bowl of figs and strawberries from my garden. He flung himself on them, and in a second had devoured twelve figs and about six pounds of strawberries. Next day I dined with his Majesty. The table was suited to hold eight covers, but they had contrived to fit in twelve. The Czar presided in a night-cap, with his throat bare, and without his cravat. We all sat down the sides, but at about half-a-foot distance from the table. Two soldiers handed round a dish, in which there was literally nothing, but every one had beside him an earthenware dish, in which there was soup and a morsel of meat. Still, the food was thus so far off that we had to stretch out our arms to get at it. Any one who wished for more broth helped himself, sans façon, to his neighbor's as his Majesty did to his Chancellor's. The Admiral of the Galleys, who sat facing the Czar, had no appetite, and only bit his nails. Suddenly came a man who threw six bottles on the table as if he were playing bowls, not setting them down. The Czar took one, and gave a glass to each guest. The Chancellor, seeing that I was taking my food without salt, — the only salt-cellar being at the other end, — said, graciously, 'Sir, if you want salt, you must help yourself.' So I, not wishing to be singular, thrust my arm out past the Czar, and took as much as would do me for dinner. By this time nearly all the earthenware bowls had been upset over the cloth, and so had a good deal of the wine, which had been badly corked. Then came the second course." A soldier passing by the kitchen was given a dish to take up, and as he entered shook his head to get his hat off, his hands being full; but the Czar told him not to mind. This course consisted of veal and four fowls. "His Majesty, seeing that one of the fowls was larger than its fellows, took it up in his hand, rubbed it under his nose, and making a sign to me that it was good, flung it on my plate. It slipped down from one end of the table to the other sans mawaise rencontre, since it had the course clear, and the cloth was well greased. The dessert was a plate containing three Spa biscuits." The canon must have been a man of wit and observation, and, no doubt, often told the story. Every day the Czar grew stronger, and from this pretty place the sanguinary prince, — or rather Muscovite, as the canon said, — wrote to his son Alexis, at Naples, ordering him home, — to be done to death secretly.

After six weeks Peter the Great took his departure, graciously acknowledging to the inhabitants that he was restored; of which happy event they obsequiously begged a written testimonial, which Dr. Areschin was ordered to give them, to the effect that, though other waters had been tried, these were the only ones that had really benefited his Majesty. Some thought that so great a potentate had behaved not a little shabbily, and might have testified his acknowledgments by a substantial memorial or subscription. But the cunning inhabitants knew, perhaps, that such "a testimonial" was far better than money or a building, and was a valuable advertisement, which would bring thousands of fashionable sick, as indeed it did. But in the following year there arrived from Amsterdam a sort of memorial tablet of black marble, set, or framed, in alabaster, with an inscription in gold letters. It was the work of a Dutch sculptor, is about the size of a small tombstone, and, though the natives and the writers of the guide-books fall into raptures over the present, it must have cost his Majesty something under twenty pounds. The inscription — and the town at once placed it over a high doorway, where it cannot be read, and where it remains to this hour — is the most amazing piece of vanity and savage bombast that can be conceived:—

PETER THE FIRST, by the Grace of God, Emperor of the Russians, Religious, happy, invincible
Restorer of Military Discipline,
And first Planter of all Sciences and Arts among his People,
Who having by his own Industry
Built a most powerful Fleet of Ships,
Having infinitely augmented his Armies,
And securely settled in the very Blaze of War,
His Realms, hereditary as well as acquired,
went abroad;
And having search'd into the Manners of the several Nations
Of Europe,
Came through France to Namur and Liege,
To these Waters at Spa,
As to the Haven of Health:
And having happily drank of these most healthful Springs,
Particularly that of Geronstère,
Was restored to his former Strength,
And his desir'd Health,
In the year 1717, 22d of July.
Thence returning through Holland
To his hereditary Dominions, Order'd this eternal Monument of his Gratitude to be erected. 1718.

With this prestige and diploma, it is not surprising to learn that the little place was taken into high favor by kings and princes; and many of these, petting, as it were, a favorite child, gave it "protections," and assurances of its neutrality being respected in case of war. Princes of Orange, Archdukes of Austria, three Emperors of Germany, various Kings of France, were among those who accorded it this favor. Louis XV. went so far as to allow Spa to show the royal arms and ensigns, — in his time, however, not of very much value as a protection.

During this pleasant flow of prosperity, the corruption produced by such a curious gathering of adventurers of both sexes, and the piquant levelling of all ranks, began to engender that strange taste and fashion, which, up to our own day, has made the cure by mineral waters and gaming go hand in hand. This odd conjunction may be traced in some measure to the doctors, who were always prescribing cards and the excitement of play as a stimulant against the drowsiness which the drinking of the waters brought on. The pastime soon became a perfect rage. At every corner, at every house, the adventurer and the demirep set up their table for Faro, Cavagnole, and Biribi. They were seen beside the innocent fountains, even on the Seven-o'clock promenade. The arch-adventurer of all, — Casanova, — a perfect and high-class type of the man who lived by his wits, who had made every capital in Europe his stage, — was not likely to pass by so congenial a place. But the wits of which he lived were very different from the vulgar ones which the journeymen of the profession are obliged to work with. He had ambition, genius, esprit, and worked more or less by their power over the minds of others. This intriguer and gambler made his way to Spa in the year 1716, and found it full to overflowing. His wife found him a lodging at a hatter's, whence he went out to study the curious spectacle. It was a perfect tripot. There he met Santa Croce, an adventurer of the same order, and there he gambled and won four hundred louis. His companion, however, not so fortunate, anticipated the dismal story which is only too familiar at such places. He had plenty of money, and began with the great game on the "tapis vert," which was even then the sacred gambling color. Three weeks later his "secretary" left him; next day the lady's-maid received her congé; the two valets were the first to desert. In a few days the last crown had gone. Rings, watches, plate, jewels, everything went the same road. Even the clothes of his wife were sold to make up a last stake, and then he walked with a friend up one of the roads out of the town, there bade adieu, and left his unfortunate companion behind. Even the tricks common to the modern tables then obtained, and just as now, when a piece of money is heard to fall the servants rush to see that no one stoops good-naturedly to look for it, so even then gentlemen of industry had their broad-pointed canes, with soft wax at the end; and dogs were trained to snap up any stray pieces. Some tables, however, were kept with an approach to respectability; and the name of Mr. Alexander Hay, a Scotch adventurer, is handed down with honor as one who kept his "bank" with tolerable honor.

This license, it was felt, was growing dangerous, and might injure the place. The magistrates began to consider the question seriously. To put down the gaming on moral grounds would have as little occurred to them as it would to M. Servais, the present excellent Burgomaster, and his brother échevins. They only thought, as do their present successors, how it could be best "controlled," or even "exploited," for the advantage of the town. A Prince Bishop of Augsburg, who doted on this little happy valley, and came there regularly for fifteen years running, and planted a good deal of the Seven-o'clock Walk, was persuaded to appeal to the sovereign of the place, — the Cardinal Prince Bishop of Liège, — and in 1762 the commune obtained a sole concession and monopoly for opening a bank. On any one who infringed it a fine of fifty louis was laid. At once money was raised; splendid plans for rooms, halls, ball-rooms, and theatre were drawn out, and the buildings were pushed on with vigor. Suddenly affairs took a most curious turn; the townspeople protested against the scheme, on the ground of danger to morals from an official sanctioning of such dangerous practices. A regular movement was got up, and the Cardinal Bishop dying in the mean time, the magistrates were obliged to give up the scheme. This piece of ostentatious self-denial cannot be ascribed to conscientious objections; it is too improbable that those who fattened on the strangers, and who, as Casanova said, earned in three months enough to keep themselves the whole year, should have any such scruples. The solution of the opposition of the townsfolks is to be found in their fear of a diminution of profits from the letting of their houses as banks, and the falling off of the crowds of adventurers. They were also afraid of the increased burden on the rates which the new buildings would entail. It is really curious that one hundred years later, when the magistrates were raising money to construct a sumptuous bath-house, — a scheme that was sure to "pay," — there should have been the same ignorant opposition.

When foiled the townspeople showed their real motives, as well as their stupidity. They encouraged rival companies, who were glad to build other handsome palaces for gaming; the result was that this little townlet soon possessed no less than three magnificent establishments, — the "Wauxhall," the "Levoz Rooms," and the "Redoute," — a supply which few of even the great capitals could boast of. Then followed rivalings, wranglings, suits at law, until a compromise was agreed to, and, like competing railway companies, the three societies amalgamated to fleece the common public. Very soon this abundance of places of resort was worked up by the company into a pleasant source of variety, and it became the fashion for every one of distinction to go up to the "Wauxhall" for breakfast, and after breakfast commence playing. Play at the "Redoute" and other houses did not set in until the evenings.

By and by arrives Alfieri. His souvenir is quite in a depressing tone: "I leave this spot, always longing to return to it, with a heart discharged from a weight of sorrow. The life here suits my humor. I find noise and solitude united. I can be alone, unnoticed, and unknown in the heart of fêtes and amusements. In truth, the whole place has so pleased me, that I have lingered on from August to the end of September, — a long time for one like me who cannot fix myself in any single spot. Of mornings I ride; of evenings I dine with people of all countries; at night I look on at the pretty women and girls who are dancing; and thus I pass my time most pleasantly."

Now we see the King of Sweden arrive, on June 22, 1780, — travelling as the Count de Haga, — attended by lords of his court, and putting up at the "Black Lion," on the Place. He remained nearly nine weeks, and spent a pleasant life: riding in the mornings, giving entertainments to people of all countries, showing himself at balls and theatres, mixing in the crowd, and winning, according to the well-worn phrase, "golden opinions." The following year another illustrious stranger arrived, travelling incognito, who entered the place on foot, with only General de Terey as his companion; and was actually there some time before he was discovered. He went straight to the "Hotel d'Orange," where he saw Prince Lichtenstein, and then crossed over and put up at the "Court of London," and paid a visit to Prince Henry of Prussia, and dined with Prince de Lichtenstein. But at night, when he appeared at the ball, it became known that the pseudo Count de Falckenstein was no other than the Emperor. He, too, delighted everybody, not merely with his graciousness, — a rather cheap gift in royalty, — but by his hospitality, and the share he took in all the amusements. He drank the water of every fountain; invited the ladies to dance at the pretty Géronstère, breakfasted in public, and bore tremendous mobbing with the most perfect good-humor.

But the year 1782 was, indeed, a year of glory. The little place sparkled with kings, princesses, and dukes. What would not Homburg or Monaco give for such a strangers' list as the following? — The Princess de Ligne, Duchess de l'Infantado, Rohan, Prince Galitzin, Duke de Gravina, Duke de Fronsac, Duke and Duchess of Gloucester, Prince Youssouppoff, Duchess of Chatillon, Princess Staremberg, Archduchess of Austria, Paul Petrowitz, Grand Duke of Russia, Princess Hesse Rheinfels, Prince Kourakin, Bishop of Chartres, Count de Montecucoli, Papal Nuncio, Prince D'Aremberg, Princess Gagarin, Duke de Paduli, Prince Wiasemskoi, Archbishop of Gmese, Duchess Corzwareem Looz, Prince de Troubetzkoy, and the Prince of Mecklenbourg-Schwerin. For the Russian Prince there was great feasting, and the court newsmen of the day noted with satisfaction that, as he stood drinking his Pouhon, he exhibited a great deal of sensibility when he saw the Czar's meagre testimonial.

Others came, too, — the handsome Duke de Lauzun, — who had some curious adventures there with the Princess Czartoriska, — Philip Egalité, and the Count D'Artois. But the Revolution came suddenly; the guests and strangers all fled precipitately; the croupiers gathered up their cards and dice. Two years later there was a rally, when the French emigrés attempted to make Spa a centre for planning their schemes, and the season was rather brilliant. But after that, with the great wars that followed, everything collapsed: the little place was, as it were, trampled down in the mêlées. When kingdoms were being tossed about, — lost and won, — no one had time to think of drinking the Pouhon or playing Faro. Indeed, no one could travel securely and get to Spa. Sometimes, indeed, the arrival of the Queen of Westphalia, or the Princess Borghese, brought a few strangers. The lamps were relit; the cards dealt once more. This was merely a spasm. Not until after the battle of Waterloo, when the Prince of Orange arrived, wounded, to drink the waters, did Spa begin to revive. It was now Dutch; and the Prince forwarded them many grants of money. His memory is therefore held in grateful odor. Kings then began to come once more, — the Emperor Alexander, Emperor Nicholas, the Duke of Cumberland, and the greater Duke of Wellington. These all crowded over from Aix-la-Chapelle during the Congress, and the place was so crammed that the townsfolk — in the phrase sacred to innkeepers and lodging-houses — reaped a golden harvest indeed. The Prince of Orange, says a grateful local chronicler, was "indeed a god for Spa." Since that day it has prospered exceedingly, its visitors increasing every year. They used to boast that war was the only thing that did them harm. But now a blow is coming worse than war. In three or four years, when the gaming-houses are closed, it will be all over with Spa.

Such is the rather dramatic, and certainly picturesque, story of the little place.

SOME BAR STORIES, OLD AND NEW.

It is a curious fact, well known to members of the bar, and probably to all who are engaged in public speaking, that after applying itself continuously for several hours to an argument or an oratorical effort, the brain becomes suddenly incapable of going on, the supply of nervous matter is exhausted, and the speaker "loses his head." This will sometimes happen even to the best men unless they are wise in time, and take advantage of the short breathing space allowed by the court in the middle of the day, course there are some men who begin by losing their heads; witness the case of the nervous young counsellor, who, having thrice enunciated the words, "May it please you, my Lord, and gentlemen of the jury," was desired to proceed, with the assurance which the Bench gave him that thus far he had the Court wholly with him. But the process of losing head through over-long tension of the brain is liable to occur to the most experienced practitioner; and where judges will not give a man back the thread of his argument, and say, "If I understood you aright, sir, you were contending that," etc. etc. this liability may lead to disaster in the case.

There is a good story, never before published, which was told to the writer by one of the most eminent of living judges, illustrating this fact, and showing the readiness with which the want of brain power was apprehended, and opportunity given for recovering the equilibrium, on a celebrated occasion.

Mr. Brougham (afterwards Lord Brougham) was junior with Mr. —, a leading counsel of the day, in a cause célèbre that nearly concerned the royal family. The leader, oppressed with the responsibility of his charge, and weary with his exertions, had been addressing the court in close argument for several hours, when it was apparent to every one that his mind had suddenly ceased to act in unison with his speech. Mr. — became flurried, stammered, and began to plunge. Brougham saw what had happened, and instantly rose, interrupted his chief, and addressed the Court. Wearing upon his face an expression of great suffering, he assured their lordships of his deep regret at having to trouble them at such a time with a matter personal to himself. He did it most unwillingly, but he was sure their lordships would forgive him if they only knew the agony he was then enduring in his right ear by reason of the killing draught that rushed through "that door leading into the Common Pleas." He was nearly mad with ear-ache. What he should do if the nuisance continued he could not tell. Might he, in the interests of his clients, entreat the interposition of the Bench? The Bench consoled with Mr. Brougham on his suffering, and at once ordered measures to be taken to stop the draught. "That door leading into the other court" was shut, but still the draught came; windows were examined, and sand-bags were placed against the openings in them, till the nuisance was abated, — till a good quarter of an hour had been consumed, — till Mr. Brougham's leader had had time to recover himself. It is, perhaps, needless to add that the "intelligent junior" had not an ache or pain in all his great body.

It used to be said of Brougham that he slept only once a week, — viz., — from Saturday afternoon to Monday morning. Certain it is he was capable of undergoing the greatest bodily and mental fatigue, and, when occasion required it, could sit up night after night at work without appearing to be any the worse. This was no light matter, considering what was then the daily professional routine of a counsel in first-rate practice, — a routine to which few advocates would, or perhaps could, now submit. At nine A. M. at chambers, in court by ten, at chambers again by four for consultations, in hall for dinner at five, in chambers once more at seven, there to stay till twelve o'clock and often later, preparing for court next day, or advising upon cases left for "counsel's opinion." Such was, in Brougham's time, the daily programme of a successful barrister's life in London. Circuit brought him briefs, but no relief from work, and that at a time when men had to ride round the circuit, and could not, as now, quietly read a whole bagful of briefs in the comfortable railway carriage, which transports them, without exertion or anxiety on their part, from London to York. Truly there were giants in those days.

Counsel are sometimes — not by any means so often as they deserve — answered by witnesses in their own style. It was not a bad reply that made by a witness in the Grenville-Murray perjury case. One of the counsel, after pressing a witness who had given information to tell him what certain persons had said about his having given this information, added, "They said you had split, in fact"; but the witness, no way cast down by the insinuation, replied, "They expressed themselves in much more gentlemanly language than that."

This reminds me of the counsel who had been bullying a witness, and asked him how far he had been from a certain place. "Just four yards, two feet, and six inches," was the answer. "How came you to be so exact, my friend?" "Because I expected some fool or other would ask me, and so I measured it."

The writer remembers a counsel who mimicked a witness to his great annoyance, and when the witness, who was a north countryman, pronounced the word "waters" as if it had been "watters," inquired of him whether in his part of the country they spelt "waters" with two i's. "No," said the witness, "but they spell 'manners' with two n's."

Dunning (afterwards Lord Ashburton) wanted to get out of a witness why he had taken up his residence in the verge of the court, — that is, in sanctuary, — and after pressing him a good deal, elicited the answer that it was "in order to avoid the rascally impertinence of dunning."

Some counsel, who are adepts in the art of cross-examination, and who think it desirable to discredit every witness, are so unable to divest themselves of the habit that they intuitively try to discredit their own witnesses. The writer remembers hearing the case of Kemp versus Neville, in which a young woman sought to recover damages against the authorities of a university for having caused her to be "proctorized," she being, as alleged, a thoroughly respectable person. A nursemaid being produced as one of the witnesses was too fine a lady to say she was a nurse, and answered the question of counsel by saying that her occupation was to take charge of infants. Upon this came the further question — suggested, perhaps, by the nature of the case in court — "By infants, do you mean undergraduates under the age of twenty-one?" was put by the counsel. The laugh was, of course, against the nurse, and the barrister triumphed; but it is easy to see how a good reply to his observation would have turned his triumph into mortification. Juries are too often led away by seeming disputes between judge and counsel, and between counsel and witnesses, into a belief that what has strictly to do with those persons themselves has something to do with the case also; and the writer has known verdicts of the most astounding character given evidently because of some bias imparted to the case by an altercation that had nothing to do with it.

A few years ago these altercations between judge and counsel were the frequent occasions of duels, which were not looked upon with such disfavor as they might have been by the junior members of the profession. It used to be said of Lord Norbury, whose career was a rapid one, that "he shot up into promotion." Certain it is he fought a great many duels. Curran, who was a small man, was objected to on that account by his antagonist, a lawyer, who was a very big man; but Curran suggested, in order to make all right, that the size of his own figure should be chalked on his adversary's body, and that any shots outside the chalk lines should go for nothing.

It has sometimes happened that altercations of an unseemly kind have taken place between prisoner and judge, not only in Judge Jeffrey's days, but much more recently; and there are some anecdotes on record of almost brutal behavior on the part of the judge towards the prisoner. A justice of the Queen's Bench, whose name was associated with much that was indecorous and with all that was learned thirty years ago, was trying a man for his life. The prisoner, being found guilty, was asked the usual question whether he had anything to urge why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, and thereupon called God to witness his innocence, inviting the Almighty to strike him dead where he stood if he were guilty. When the prisoner had done, the judge waited a minute or two, and then said: "Prisoner at the bar! since Providence does not seem disposed to interfere in the manner you have indicated, the sentence of the court is that you be taken from this place to the place whence," etc. etc. and the man was condemned to death in the usual manner.

A Scotch judge condemned a man to be hanged on the 28th of the month for sheep-stealing. As the poor convict was being removed he exclaimed, "My lord, my lord, I haena got justice here the-day." The judge looked up from his papers and said, — it was, doubtless, considered a good joke at the time, — "Weel, weel, my man, ye'll get it on the 28th."

At one time it was the practice, though it was never legal, to punish juries by fine or imprisonment for verdicts which were not according to what the judge considered right. The Star Chamber arrogated to itself jurisdiction in the matter, and, sending for jurors who had dared to go counter to the wishes of the court, rated them soundly, and often fined or imprisoned them. This was frequently the case in Tudor and Stuart times, the only justification for it being that then juries were notoriously bribed, or were deterred by fear of family or state influence from giving a true verdict according to the evidence. Had the court continued to the present day, it might have felt disposed to interfere in a case that actually occurred not long ago on the Oxford Circuit. The son of the squire at X—, in Worcestershire, was a barrister, and went the circuit. When the judges reached X—, a brief was put into the hands of the squire's son to enable him to conduct the defence in a case for trial in which there was no defence at all. The case proceeded upon evidence so clear and telling against the prisoner, that every one in the court expected the jury to turn round in their box and give a verdict against him. To the surprise of all, certainly of the counsel for the prisoner, the jury retired, and, coming into court again, returned a verdict of Not Guilty. A few days afterwards the squire was riding about his land, and was accosted the remarkable words, "Uz fetched 'un aff, I reckon, th' other day, zur"; and on being questioned, explained that some of the jury at the trial "wur for givin' a vardict agin your zun, zur, but uz knew our duty better than that." Truly the prisoner was fortunate in his choice of counsel.

It is exceedingly difficult in some parts of the country to get verdicts of guilty in cases involving capital punishment. The feeling is so strong against executions, and is probably influenced by some considerations of a religious nature as to the responsibility of sending a murderer to his account, that it is nearly impossible to get verdicts. The jurors prefer to do what they think the less evil, to break their oaths "a true verdict to give according to the evidence," to causing a man to be put to death. They have precedents enough in the juries who tempered the rigor of the bloody code that Romilly swept away by finding, when hanging was the punishment for theft of articles exceeding twelvepence in value, that the prisoner was guilty, but that the value of the article stolen, perhaps a watch or a trinket, was under twelvepence value.

FOREIGN NOTES.

A RICH banker of Mulhausen is the winner of the prize of £ 200,000 at the last drawing of the city of Paris bonds.

THE "Tin Trumpet" is now acknowledged by the permission of the family, to be the work of Horace Smith, author of the "Rejected Addresses."

MR. BOUICCAULT is said to be writing for the Princess's Theatre a drama with the rather curious title of "Jezebel." This seems unnecessary after "Formosa."

If the portrait of Swinburne which appeared in the last number of the "Lady's own Paper" is a good likeness, the poet's friends did an unkind thing to publish it.

SAINT BEUVÉ's funeral was very quietly conducted. Among those present were Dumas, Angier, Rénan, Flaubert, Prévost Paradol, Madame Sand, and others less known to fame.

MR. HENRY I. BYRON, the author of numerous light plays, has made his appearance on the London stage in a comic drama of his own writing called "Not such a Fool as he looks."

THE last new comic journal in London is called the "Gayety Gazette." We thought that the first number had reached the lowest depth of dreariness. We had not seen the second number then.

THE very choice library of the Comte de Corbière (ex-Ministre de l'Intérieur) will be sold by auction in Paris on the 1st of December. There are 1,600 choice works, among them the "Cicero" of 1466, printed by Fust.

GENERAL GARIBALDI's forthcoming work takes the form of a novel, based, however, upon actual occurrences, and written in the striking and poetical language peculiar to the great Italian Liberator. The revelations which it contains in reference to matters ecclesiastical and social in Italy are reported to be of a remarkably startling character.

THE British Museum has lately received the fossil remains of a flying dragon, measuring upwards of four feet from tip to tip of the expanded wings.

part of the trunk with the ribs, blade-bones, and collar-bones are imbedded in dark lias shale from Lyme Regis, on the Dorsetshire coast. The head is large in proportion to the trunk, and the tail is as long as the rest of the body; it is extended in a straight stiff line, the vertebral bones being surrounded and bound together by bundles of fine long needle-shaped bones; it is supposed to have served to keep outstretched, or to sustain, a large expanse of the flying membrane or parachute which extended from the tips of the wings to the feet, and spread along the space between the hind-limbs and tail, after the fashion of certain bats. The first indication of this monster was described by Buckland in the "Transactions of the Geological Society," and is referred to in his "Bridgewater Treatise," under the name of Pterodactylus macroryz. The subsequently acquired head and tail give characters of the teeth and other parts, which establish a distinct generic form in the extinct family of flying Reptiles. The animal, as now restored, will be described and figured in the volume of the Monographs of the Paleontographical Society, for the present year by Professor Owen.

At the uncovering of the monument erected in Kensal Green Cemetery to the memory of Leigh Hunt, Lord Houghton presided over the ceremony. "Lord Houghton said his presence there that day suggested a remonstrance and a regret. It was strange that a man of letters, whose acquaintance with Leigh Hunt could only have been in the later years of his life, and who had no very intimate association with him, except for the circumstance of having been a biographer of a young poet in whose fame he was deeply interested, should have been addressing this assemblage instead of one of those mature men who had become the glory of our English literature. He was told that one reason why such a person was not addressing the assemblage was that objections were entertained in some quarters to ceremonials like that. He could have no such plea, because he could not see in such a simple ceremony as that anything which could be injurious to any one. He was sure such ceremonials were useful to us, and to the community in which we live. We English are not a hero-worshipping people, and there was no fear that such a meeting would degenerate into vulgar adulation. We were reticent of our praise. We were very careful of our applause. Therefore he would say that he could not admit the plea for the absence of such men as those he missed from that place on such an occasion. At the same time it was a matter of great regret to all to miss the presence of the contemporaries of Leigh Hunt. However, among the many of those great contemporaries so few were left who could have been present at that simple ceremonial that they naturally looked to see Mr. Procter, the Barry Cornwall of bygone times; and he would have been present on that ground but that the infirmities of age prevented him.

"It was true that Leigh Hunt represented a past generation — it might be said two generations of our literature — and that was all the greater reason for honoring his tomb that day. That tomb would not stand in association with the man to whom it was raised only, for it would beckon to the shore of Greece, where Byron passed away; it would point to that beautiful cemetery in which the remains of Keats reposed, and it would call to memory the storm-bowed life of Shelley. It would cause many to think of those pleasant Westmoreland hills where Wordsworth was at rest, and it would carry their memories to more familiar graveyards, where the wit of Charles Lamb was forever silenced, and where the busy brain of Coleridge speculated no more. Among that generation of poets Leigh Hunt was recognized as a companion, and by the best of those he was loved as a friend. He was all in all a true English poet. His was not merely the faculty of imagination, or an appreciation of what was noble and grand in literature; but he was born a poet and he died a poet. By the monument they had raised that day they would honor not only the man, but the poetic intellect of the country, which would ever be associated with the name of Leigh Hunt. Into the private life of the poet it was not his place to enter. With all his sensitive enjoyment of luxury, Leigh Hunt was a most self-denying man, and, though cognizant of all the advantages which social position could give, he steadfastly refused all the temptations which he thought might hamper and restrain his independence. To the end of a hard life he kept an evenness of temper which the most successful might have envied, and the wealthiest might have adored. The noble lord concluded by quoting the lines —

'The woe is short, 'tis fugitive, 'tis past,
The song which sweetens it may last.'

The company then proceeded to the tomb. The monument was uncovered, Lord Houghton saying, 'In the name of the subscribers to this monument, and of the friends of Mr. Leigh Hunt who remember him, and are careful of his fame, I present this monument to his family, to the country, and to posterity.'

IN THE FALL.

THE old autumnal stillness holds the wood;

Thin mist of autumn makes the day a dream;
And country sounds fall faint, half understood
And half unheeded, as to sick men seem
The voices of their friends when death is near,
And earth grows vaguer to the tired ear.

At soft gray dawns and softer evening ends
The air is echoless and dull with dews;
And leaves hang loose, and whosoever wends
His way through woods is 'ware of altered hues
And alien tints; and oft with hollow sound
The chestnut husk falls rattling to the ground.

Now comes the faint warm smell of fresh-built ricks,
And empty fields look up at empty skies,
And smoke floats sidelong from the burning quicks,
And low across the stunted stubble flies
The whirring covey, till its wings have grown
A murmur — then, a memory alone.

Now, haply on some sunless afternoon
When brooding winds are whispering to the leaves,
Shrill twittered half-notes fill the air, and soon
From farm-house thatch and cosey cottage eaves
The circling swallows call their eager brood
And straight fly south, by unseen summers wooed.

A certain sadness claims these autumn days, —
A sadness sweeter to the poet's heart
Than all the full-fed joys and lavish rays
Of riper suns; old wounds, old woes, depart;
Life calls a truce, and Nature seems to keep Herself a hush to watch the world asleep.

THE DEATH PENALTY.

A NARRATIVE.

By JULES SIMON.

[Translated from the French by MR. W. H. HUNTINGTON for EVERY SATURDAY.]

ENVOI.

To V. H.

I will not write your name in full, for it is too great and my present is too small.

The title of this volume is my excuse for offering it to you. The death penalty will soon disappear from our codes. It is you who will have effaced it.

Six months ago you sent me a Book. In return I address you a few pages, whose only merit is that they contain the narration of an actual fact and the expression of sincere sentiments. When I wrote them thirty years ago, I still had my doubts. Now, thanks to you, I doubt no longer, and am your debtor.

PART FIRST.

I.

AURAY, which we call a town in Brittany, would be but a hamlet if transported to the neighborhood of Paris. It has from three to four thousand inhabitants. It bathes the foot of its old walls in a little river whose waters a little farther on mingle with the sea. A main street, ill-paved and lined with houses built of wood and earth, begins at the bridge and climbs up by a steep slope to an oblong square, where stands the town-hall, a sufficiently tasteless and almost modern structure, for it dates from within the first half of the seventeenth century. A few narrow streets branch off from this main artery and go straggling out into the country. The architects who constructed them were ignorant of the laws of symmetry, — which is no great harm. Each house follows its own whim, without heed to its neighbor, pushing forward, standing back, presenting itself sideways or gable-end first, according to the shape of the ground and size of the lots. The basement is generally in cut stone; but the walls of the second story, which projects over the street, are built with old rough-hewn timbers painted a dull red and filled in with a mortar made of mud and straw.

Irregular windows with panes of glass as large as one's hand, niches with coarsely colored plaster statues, queer signs creaking on iron rods, high slate roofs capped with lead or surmounted with some chimerical animal in tin, give to the whole the air of a town of the Middle Ages, that had been kept under glass for three or four centuries. The inhabitants contribute nothing to destroy this illusion. The peasants one meets in the streets market-days wear heavy white wooden shoes, brown gaiters coming up to the knees, short breeches full of plaits, a leather girdle, a long-skirted brown or blue coat, and a low hat, in the shadow of whose immense broad brim their marked and somewhat wild features are hardly discernible. Among themselves, young and old speak nothing but Low Breton, French being considered a learned tongue for the use of the gentry who have been to Vannes. The merchants spread out their wares as far as the middle of the street: a pile of cloth on a table, a cask of pork, a great heap of red and white soap, molasses, candles, — all these in picturesque confusion serve as baits to catch customers. If you go into a shop, a sort of den lighted only from the door, which you enter by descending four or five stone steps, the mistress of the place will sell you on the same table a pound of butter and two yards of ribbon: the specialty has not yet penetrated the good town of Auray. Accounts are kept in livres, sous, and deniers in the fashion of the old time before the Revolution; centimes exist only for the tax collector. In 1833 I heedlessly bought there an almanac that proved to be of the year of the coronation of Charles X. When afterwards I ventured to object to its antiquity, the dealer answered, with the entrest coolness, that it gave the days for the fairs, markets, and pardons all the same. Almanacs of such freshness, together with a few alphabets, church-service books, and store of prayer-books in Low Breton made up at that period the assortment of the sole bookseller's shop in the town. It was there, however, that I obtained a copy of a book, now become extremely rare, — the Supplement to the History of France, published by Father Loriequet in 1816.

Auray is a small port, and carries on a quite active coasting trade with Vannes, Lorient, and Belle-Ile. Houses have been built from time to time all along the quay so as to form a lower town, not much esteemed by the people of the upper town, but more alive and more familiar with affairs of this world. Between the two towns rises the still frowning cuirass of stone, with its towers and its battlements, behind which Duguesclin took shelter. This remnant of the power of our dukes has a solidity and grandeur in marked contrast with the sorry houses that crowd about it, like a timorous flock of sheep. Time has taken no hold on these great stones, of a red and strong grain, that would bid defiance to artillery. On the towers, in place of the pointed roofs, of which no vestiges remain, worthy citizens have built small houses, all white with cheerful green blinds. They have arranged bits of gardens there, where there are bowers covered with white thorn and flowering elder. These slight plants and vines crown the battlements, crop out from gaping, half-ruined gates, and hang waving down the sides of the granite giant. It is good of an evening to come in from the sea to the mouth of the little stream that bears the same name as the town. Everything is still as in the open fields; the great masses of the wall stand out boldly against the sky, surrounded with an inextricable tangle of small houses, green trees, and pointed steeples. The coasting-luggers lie motionless, casting their black shadows on the water, and rippling over the shingle of the beach the river murmurs softly to the sea.

II.

I was living retired there towards the close of the year 1833, at an epoch when I was in search of my path through the wide world, drawn toward Paris by the passion of study, withheld in this quiet corner by love of the natal soil and the dear memories of childhood. If I add that I was living with the rector of Notre Dame, and in intimate relations with the most decided chouans, it is not thence to be understood that I am a devotee or a legitimist; although I was then but a child, I had lost nearly all claim to the first of these titles, and I never had any to the second. The Abbé Moisan had an ardent friendship for my father; I think that he owed to him his life under the first republic. While I was pursuing my studies at the college in Vannes, I had been in the habit of spending a part of the vacation at the parsonage of Auray, and felt myself at home there. I had my room, which was never given up to the neighboring vicars when they came, in groups of five or six, — as the custom of the Breton clergy is, — to demand the hospitality of the rector: Old Annah, as much mistress as servant of the house, who enjoyed a reputation for general crabbedness, following the example of her master, had taken me into her good graces, and treated me like one of the family.

The Abbé Moisan was then seventy years old. He was a tall man, astonishingly lean, with a big head and great hands, straight as a ramrod, despite his age, and the gait of a grenadier. When he walked with me of an evening in his garden, bareheaded, in his shirt-sleeves, cheerily smoking his pipe, you would have sooner taken him for an old soldier than a priest. He had, however, been ordained deacon at twenty-one; but his life had not been all spent in saying mass and hearing confession. He remained in France during the Reign of Terror, disguised as a farm laborer, following the plough, mowing, tending the horses, and passing with good reason for a first-rate farm-hand. When evening was come, he let himself out from the window of the hay-loft, and ran hither and thither through the night to exhort the peasants and receive their confessions. As soon as there were any bands of chouans, he joined them as chaplain, of course. The "Blues" used to say that he had pulled a trigger with Cadoudal and Guillemot, which was a downright falsehood; but I can well believe that he more than once had to resist temptation in that direction. It is he who carried the messages from one troop to another, taking on numberless disguises and running numberless risks. In my mere infancy I had been rocked to sleep with the story of the adventures of Abbé Moisan, which were truly marvellous if the quarter that was told was true. When Bonaparte officially re-established religion, by giving to several constitutional bishops, with the Pope's assent, dioceses which they had usurped, and of which the titular holders were still living, there was found in various districts, under the name of the Little Church, a congregation of the faithful that aimed to be, and probably was, more catholic than the Pope, since it refused submission to bishops elected by the Revolution and reconfirmed by the Empire. Abbé Moisan belonged to this Little Church, and continued on that account to be persecuted when the Catholic clergy no longer were. He had lived the life of a proscribed man for twenty-two years, when the Restoration came. The Count of Artois obtained for him the Cross of Saint Louis, which he accepted respectfully and never wore. He had only to choose among the richest parishes. He desired nothing but the post of prison chaplain, which no one disputed with him. It was then less than ever a sinecure. The civil war and its consequences, which were prolonged for several years in the West, crowded the prisons with political offenders, and ordinary crimes multiplied by occasion of the troublous times. The jail at Vannes, to which M. Moisan was attached, differed widely from the prisons of our day, which in their exterior look like hospitals or barracks, and for their interior are objected to by a certain variety of philanthropists as being too comfortable. It was an old city gate-house, flanked by two high-roofed, pepper-box towers. It had neither inner nor outer court-yard. Prisoners could snuff a breath of fresh air on a narrow stone gallery, that connected the two towers above the gate, and had in its time served for the sentries to make their round. They were visible from the Rue des Chanoines, so that when there were any condemned to death, which happened often enough, these could be pointed out from there.

The Abbé Moisan, who in ordinary times hardly left the prison, except to go to Madame Normand's for his dinner, and to the chapel of Saint Vincent Ferrier to say his mass, did not come out at all when he had any condemned to death or to hard labor, and separated from them only on the scaffold or when they were taken away. He did not pass the time, as other priests are wont to do, in preaching or reciting prayers to them. He talked with them as a friend. If they were old chouans they had long stories to tell of their old campaigns. He put himself at their service for the least trifles, doing their poor commissions in the town. We used to see him hurrying on such errands past our windows, for we boarded at Madame Normand's close by the cathedral and the jail. The Abbé Le Ber would shout out to him from the distances, "Has he confessed?" "Not yet," he would answer. He was waiting for the hour of grace. And he awaited it day and night, lying in the cell of the prisoner on a bundle of straw. On the days of execution everybody was in the streets immediately after the morning Angelus. They prayed for the condemned man and for the Abbé Moisan. When the death-bell began tolling at Saint Paterne, at the colleges, and at the seminary, it was the signal that the cortege had left the prison, — the escort of gendarmes on horseback, the condemned, with shorn hair, bare neck, his hands tied behind him, and his legs shackled, walking between the confessor and the executioner, and, close behind, the cart holding his coffin. My comrades used then to hurry along the Rue de Mené, that traverses the town; they crowded together on the steps of the Calvary, which is by the college gate, for the condemned usually knelt there and recited aloud a prayer, to which all present made response. I never had the heart to go there; but what I have seen many a time is the chain.

That has been abolished; but in those days criminals sentenced to the galleys went on foot, chained together by the neck, from Bicêtre, by Paris, to Brest or Toulon. The chain stopped at Vannes to take in the contingent of our assize court, and then the Abbé Moisan never failed to accompany his prisoners, embracing them, holding their hands, dressing their wounds when they were bruised by the iron collar or when the brand-mark was not healed over. And so he went on foot as far as Auray with all these men exasperated with fatigue and shame, calmly listening to their insults and oaths. He ate at the same boarding-house as myself, with the Abbé Le Ber, a jansenist priest and a republican, whom my friend, Dr. Guépin, knew very well, and with three or four collegians, one of whom, by the way, has since become Senator. He did not come the days of execution; he did not think of dinuer those days, but we used to see him come in the day following, pale as a sheet. No one dared speak to him, and we did not even speak to each other. He would unfold his napkin, look about him with an attempt to smile, restrain, with great effort, the tears that rose to his eyes, then swallow a glass of water and go away, taking with him a piece of dry bread. He was seriously ill in 1827, after the execution of the two Lebras, whom he always persisted in declaring innocent. It was then that Bishop de Lamothe constrained him to accept the cure of Auray.

This was not more distressing to him than to the pious women of his new parish. In the first days they surrounded his confessional, but he was accustomed to a different sort of penitents! They found him too rough and at the same time too indulgent, and deserted him in a body for his vicars. One of these was that Abbé Martin who has since been a celebrated preacher at Paris. M. Moisan asked nothing better than to be thus deserted. His success in the pulpit equalled that of the confessional. He once undertook to repeat a sermon of the Abbé Poule, but broke down at the second point of the argument, and never after preached except in Low Breton on Sunday at the first mass. He did a great deal of good, which did not, however, distinguish him from his brethren, for our Breton clergy, from the curé of the cathedral to the humblest priest of a chapel of ease, pass their lives in giving, and in asking that they may give again. When, toward the end of the Restoration, I went to install myself for a week or two in September at the Abbé Moisan's, I found him in low spirits, discouraged, sick. He suffered from feeling himself useless. He only revived a little when recounting his battles, as he called them, or when speaking of the condemned whom he had conducted on their way to death. He spoke of them as if they were his children; there was not one of them whom he did not love and speak well of. Old Annah told me that his sadness returned when I was gone, and "that he had not enough to do."

What was strange was, that he seemed to grow young again after 1830. Everything about him also changed; he became the important man, or rather the idol of the town. I was not long in learning why. There had been in Brittany, after the "Glorious Days of July" a powerless attempt at chouannerie. The clergy for the most part threw themselves into it heart and soul. They began by obstinately refusing to chant the Domine Salvum. I recollect that the bishop, who was a Lamothe-Broons of an old legitimist family, was obliged to go in person, and have it chanted in his presence at Saint Paterne's, otherwise the Abbé Couëffic would have resisted to the end. From this first demonstration they went on to another, which was more dangerous: they advised the conscripts not to set out for their regiments. Advice from his confessor to a Breton peasant is a command. Immediately, from Auray to Ploërmel, there were bands of réfractaires, some of whom held the field against the national guards and regular troops. Several nobles offered them their chateaux for places of rendezvous. King Charles X., at Holyrood, gave an ex-major of cavalry a lieutenant-general's commission, like the one held by M de Puisaye in 1793. The same movement developed itself toward the marches of Brittany, especially at Vitre, where the disturbances were more serious. The Abbé Moisan was now in his element again. He did not take me into his confidence; I was too young and too little initiated; but I guessed by his air, by certain mysterious remarks, by the unusual affluence of visitors at the parsonage, and by the quite novel respect with which he was greeted in the street, that the rector was at war. The movement, however, was not of long duration. Two companies of movable gendarmes brought it to an end; but in the short space of eighteen months it cost a number of lives. Some perished as soldiers, by musket-shot, others on the scaffold; others, more wretched, went to die in prison at Brest, for government made a show of treating them as highway robbers, and not as political offenders. I may say of this impotent agitation, which will have no historian, and to which none of my hopes were attached, that it was the death-struggle of a noble sentiment.

Everything was irrevocably over when I became, in 1833, the guest of Abbé Moisan. I had just finished my college course, strictly at my own expense, giving lessons in writing and grammar, evening and morning, to pay my board and term bill. The Abbé, who was ambitious for his friends, wanted to see me one day professor at the college of Vannes, and urged my going to Rennes to pass examination for the bachelor's degree. He set forth that he would pay the cost of the journey, — Heaven knows where he would have found the money. I ended by going thither on foot, and obtaining entrance to the Normal School. My comrades never suspected that on holidays I always went without dinner. But I do not complain of having undergone some hardships in my childhood and youth, nor of having passed my early years as a free-thinker and republican, among Catholics and Carlists. The Abbé Moisan, who was not capable of speaking four words together, and had never read anything but his breviary and the orders of the day of M. de la Houssaye, exerted, as I think, a happy influence on my mind. I still remember, all man of letters that I have come to be, our interminable discussions, in which he was infallibly beaten, and after which I passed whole nights in discussing his arguments with myself and concluding that he was right.

III.

Capital punishment was one of our grand subjects of controversy, for he had fairly given up hopes of my conversion, and often told me, with a deep sigh, laying his hand on my shoulder, "You are lost." I was never weary of questioning him about the condemned whom he had attended at death, and above all about those whom I had known before their condemnation;—there was more than one such. He had a singular mental defect: he believed they were all innocent, and that from the bottom of his heart. I think that he did not exclude from this universal absolution even those who had owned their crime. He devised some means of transforming them into martyrs, at worst they were victims of their education, or of circumstance, or of the state of society. For the Abbé who thundered against the Saint Simonians every morning after reading the Gazette de France was, without suspecting it, a radical socialist. I am speaking here, of course, of those convicted of ordinary crimes; as for the political offenders, he not merely believed them innocent, but he regarded them as heroes; and I who share none of his political opinions am inclined to think that he was right. It will be readily imagined that he was a declared enemy of the guillotine, as he also was of the iron-collar, of the brand-mark, of the galleys, and even of prolonged confinement. He would have anathematized cellular imprisonment, if the authorities of those days had exercised their pretended right of killing the moral and intellectual man while suffering the physical man to exist. His dream was a system of short confinement, more or less severe, according to the nature of the cases, always applied with a view to moral regeneration of the subject, and at the termination of which the more dangerous convicts might be transported to a colony where the State should leave them free under certain conditions. He did not deny to society the right of killing when it was in the case of legitimate self-defence; and for instance, by a curious exception for a partisan who had exposed himself a hundred times to capital condemnation, he really admitted the death penalty for political crimes. It was then, according to him, only one of the incidents of the fight. But what he denied for ordinary crimes was the condition of legitimate defence. He considered that for the maintenance of order and assurance of the common safety society had not, and never could have, need to shed blood. In his eyes, the death penalty was barbarous because it was useless. Those who talked of the benefit of example, and regarded the spectacle of the scaffold as a salutary moral lesson, he treated as blockheads or sophists. He maintained on the contrary that cruelty of punishments begets ferocity of manners. "Believe in my experience," he would say; "blood calls for blood. Men of bad instincts who attend an execution come away not terrified but demoralized." His grand argument was the uncertainty of human judgments. He was inexhaustible on this head; he accumulated examples in proof, some of them of an overwhelming force, and all drawn from his personal recollections. His narrations were so many processes directed against the judges. He saw in them mere partisans who had the guillotine for their argument. It should be mentioned that he had seen the prevotals courts. He was used to say, among other things, that administrators of political justice rendered their decisions as soldiers obey an order; but, faithful to his principles, he added that that was what they were instituted for, and that it was their business to strike enemies and even the suspected. "What would you have a magistrate do who is himself a part of the government, to which he owes his place, from which he seeks promotion, who thinks as it does, since he serves it, when government tells him, while pointing out a political offender, 'I am in danger, defend me'?"

On this last point I entirely agreed with M. Moisan. It is not I surely who would have thought of suppressing the death penalty in political cases, to leave it in force for ordinary crimes. When I read the history of the Revolution, if my indignation, like that of any man of feeling, was aroused by the executions in mass, without judgment and without culpability, there were other executions which I found just, and which, I was sure, I would have subscribed to. I understand now why M. Moisan and I held such opinions on political law. He had lived under the Red Terror, and the Empire, and the White Terror of the early Restoration; I was myself surrounded with people who had lost their friends on the scaffold, or who had been sentenced and escaped death as by miracle. Every bloody repression begets reprisals; it is against nature to expect peace from it. The political scaffold makes not only assassins as the other scaffold does; it makes political judges.

I wish I could say at least that I shared the ideas of the ex-chaplain of the prisons in respect to common crimes; but born in 1815, between the execrated Terror and the blest Terror, I was too near the ages of blood. Around me I heard nothing but talk of answering blood with blood. I was furthermore influenced by the famous phrase in which Alphonse Karr, who has since been one of my friends, sums up all the arguments that can be brought against the abolition of the death penalty: "Let Messrs. the assassins, begin first."

We each of us repeated the same discourses, with the same warmth and the same success on either side on our way to Sainte Anne and Quiberon, and in our excursions to Vannes or to Saint-Gildas. When the Abbé could find nothing more to say, he would shut my mouth with the affair of the brothers Nayl, of which you shall presently read the account. This recollection of what was still so recent disturbed both of us, and we let our boat glide along the rocks of the coast, keeping silence and thinking of the terrible events we had so lately passed through. It was on our return from one of these excursions that he asked me to write the story of our three friends. The next day I wrote it all out at once, not to prove a proposition, as may be seen from what precedes, but as a narrative, and to fix our common memories of the events.

The worthy Abbé made me promise to publish it some day: "If ever you become an author," he added. Here it is. It has slept a long quarter of a century under my books of that day, with the manuscripts that I accumulated then with the true literary zeal of a young graduate. When, twenty years later, I read over again these very simple but very truthful narrations, with a sentiment which must resemble that of a woman who, arrived at the threshold of old age, unexpectedly comes upon a dried flower or a faded ribbon at the bottom of a drawer. I could not resist the desire of publishing one or two of them, carefully hiding myself under a name taken in turn by every one who wished not to be recognized. To-day I let appear with my signature the one I entitled The Death Penalty, because a story is sometimes worth as much as an argument.

I cannot terminate this preface without adding that my ideas on the chief point have been entirely modified by study. I now hold that capital punishment and perpetual penalties may and consequently ought to be retrenched from our codes: in a word, I deny to man, whether in political or in ordinary criminal matters, the right to inflict on man either a physical suffering or a moral stigma that is irrevocable. I do not admit either infallibility in the judge or eternity of perversity in the criminal. During some time after the foundation of the Republic in 1848, I was connected with the administration of criminal justice; I have visited a great number of prisons, in all parts of Europe, from Mazas to Millbanks; I went to Portland to inform myself of the manner in which the English will replace the death penalty when they shall have abolished it. What these long studies have especially confirmed in me is the fear of the irrevocable. There is a house in Brittany which might have sufficed me for that, but for the obstinate struggle against myself, inspired by my unwillingness to substitute sentiment for reason. But it is no longer with me a question of humanity. In demanding that society should always be left the means for repairing an error, if I think much of the victim, I think more of society itself; and I am less afraid of the harm which a judicial error inflicts on a man than of the harm it does to the administration of justice.

I am no longer as fierce as the Abbé Moisan and I were in 1833, and I am not sure — although he was a man all of one piece, and Briton to the marrow of his bones — that he would still be guilty of the frightful inconsequence of preserving the death penalty for the vanquished while abolishing it for murderers. For my own part, I am converted on both points.

I saw at Nuremberg a museum of headsman's swords, of cleavers, and instruments for chopping off hands and thumbs, for grubbing out ears and for blinding. Death shows itself there not simply atrocious; by a refinement of the genius of the torturers, in some punishments it becomes ridiculous. It is there, by the way, that was invented, long before the French revolution, our sinister guillotine, with its grooved uprights, its clamp for the neck, its blade released by a spring and effecting the decapitation by the mere fall of its heavy weight. I wish that the last guillotines, the last garrots, the last gibbets might be carried thither from all corners of the civilized earth; I finally believe that forthwith the race of Messrs. the assassins, as Alphonse Karr styles them, would begin to die out. Politics would gain by it as well as morality. Civil wars would not perhaps be less frequent, but they surely would become less atrocious.

What I have retained, in this last respect, of the opinions of M. Moisan, is an ardent desire to see political justice — since we must give it that name — utterly separated from ordinary justice. Let it employ neither the same judges nor the same places of detention. Assuredly I believe that there are a just cause and odious parties in politics; but in every political sentence it is the victor who pronounces and by virtue of his quality as victor, whether in that quality he represents justice or injustice. When fortune turns, the accused changes place with the judge. The same code is found to be good. It is true, then, that political justice is a battle, and ordinary justice a doctrine. On one hand, a question of victory and defeat; on the other, a question of good and evil. The proof that a political condemnation strikes only the victim, and not the morality of his acts, is that, despite the violence of parties, no one has ever been dishonored by proscription.

I was visiting one day, in company with some friends, the House of Detention at Ghent, I think it was in 1853. The Director asked me, just as I was coming away, how long I had myself been a prisoner. I was obliged to answer that I had not been a prisoner at all. I remember that I felt rather humiliated at having to make this answer, and that it did not do me great honor in the minds of the bystanders, — of those especially who, not being my personal friends, were ignorant of the events of my humble life.

Human justice should always be able to release its prey. Let it release the guilty man cured, when it is a guilty man; let it release the vanquished man alive, when it is only a vanquished man. But above all, if it has been mistaken, let it be able to release its victim.

MAX MÜLLER'S LECTURE ON BUDDHISTIC NIHILISM.*

I MAY be mistaken, but my belief is that the subject which I have chosen for my discourse cannot be regarded as alien to the general interests of this assembly.

Buddhism in its numerous varieties continues still the religion of the majority of mankind, and will therefore always occupy a very prominent place in a comparative study of the religions of the world. But the science of comparative theology, although the youngest branch on the tree of human knowledge, will, for an accurate and fruitful study of antiquity, soon become as indispensable as comparative philology. For how can we truly understand and properly appreciate a people, its literature, art, politics, morals, and philosophy, its entire conception of life, without having comprehended its religion, not alone in its outer aspect, but in its innermost being, in its deepest far-reaching roots?

What our great poet almost prophetically once said of languages may also be said of religions, "He who knows only one knows none." As the true knowledge of a language requires a knowledge of languages, thus a true knowledge of a religion requires a knowledge of religions. And however bold the assertion may sound, that all the languages of mankind have an Oriental origin, true it is that all religions, like the suns, have risen from the East.

Here, therefore, in treating religions scientifically

* Delivered before the General Meeting of the Association of German Philologists, at Kiel, 28th September, 1889.

(those of the Aryan as well as those of the Semitic races) the Oriental scholar lawfully enters into the "plenum" of philology, if philology still is, as our President told us yesterday, what it once intended and wished to be, viz., the true Humanitas, which, like an Emperor of yore, could say of itself, "humani nihil a me alienum puto."

Now it has been the peculiar fate of the religion of Buddha, that among all the so-called false or heathenish religions, it almost alone has been praised by all and everybody for its elevated, pure, and humanizing character. One hardly trusts one's eyes on seeing Catholic and Protestant missionaries vie with each other in their praises of the Buddha; and even the attention of those who are indifferent to all that concerns religion must be arrested for a moment, when they learn from statistical accounts no religion, not even the Christian, has exercised so powerful an influence on the diminution of crime as the old simple doctrine of the Ascetic of Kapilavastu. Indeed, no better authority can be brought forward in this respect than that of a still living Bishop of the Roman Catholic Church. In his interesting work on the life of Buddha, the author, the Bishop of Ramatha, the Apostolic Vicar of Ava and Pegu, speaks with so much candor of the merits of the Buddhist religion, that we are often at a loss which most to admire, his courage or his learning. Thus he says in one place (page 494): "There are many moral precepts equally commanded and enforced in common by both creeds. It will not be deemed rash to assert that most of the moral truths, prescribed by the Gospel, are to be met with in the Buddhist scriptures." In another place Bishop Bigandet says (p. 495): "In reading the particulars of the life of the last Buddha Gaudama, it is impossible not to feel reminded of many circumstances relating to our Saviour's life, such as it has been sketched out by the Evangelists."

I might produce many even still stronger testimonies in honor of Buddha and Buddhism, but the above suffice for my purpose.

But then, on the other hand, it appears as if people had only permitted themselves to be so liberal in the praise of Buddha and Buddhism, because they could in the end, condemn a religion which, in spite of all its merits, culminated in Atheism and Nihilism. Thus we are told by Bishop Bigandet (p. viii.): "It may be said in favor of Buddhism that no philosophical-religious system has ever upheld, to an equal degree, the notions of a savior, and deliverer, and the necessity of his mission for procuring the salvation of man, in a Buddhist sense. The rôle of Buddha, from beginning to end, is that of a deliverer, who preaches a law designed to secure to man the deliverance from all the miseries he is laboring under. But by an inexplicable and deplorable eccentricity, the pretended savior after having taught man the way to deliver himself from the tyranny of his passions, leads him, after all, into the bottomless gulf of a total annihilation."

This language may have a slightly episcopal tinge, yet we find the same judgment, in almost identical words, pronounced by the most eminent scholars who have written on Buddhism. The warm discussions on this subject, which have recently taken place at the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres of Paris, are probably known to many of those who are here present; but better still, the work of the man whose place has not since been filled neither in the French Academy, nor on the Council Board of German Science, — the work of Eugène Burnouf, the true founder of a scientific study of Buddhism. Even Burnouf, in his researches arrives at the same result, viz.: — that Buddhism as known to us from its Canonical books, in spite of its grand qualities, ends in Atheism and Nihilism.

Now, as to Atheism, it cannot be denied that if we call the old Gods of the Veda — Indra and Agni and Yama — Gods, Buddha was an Atheist. He does not believe in the divinity of these deities. What is noteworthy is that he does not by any means deny their bare existence, just as little as St. Augustine and other fathers of the Church endeavored to sublimate or entirely explain away the existence of the Olympian Gods. The founder of Buddhism treats the old Gods as superhuman beings, and promises the believers that they shall be after death reborn into the world of the Gods, and shall enjoy divine bliss with the Gods. Similarly he threatens the wicked that after death they shall meet with their punishment in the subterranean abodes and hells, where the Asuras, Sarpas, Nāgas, and other evil spirits dwell, beings whose existence was too firmly rooted in the popular belief and language than that even the founder of a new religion could have dared to reason them away. But, although Buddha assigned to these mediatized Gods and Devils, palaces, gardens, and a court, — not second to their former ones, — he yet deprived them of all their sovereign rights. Although, according to Buddha, the worlds of the Gods last for millions of years, they must perish at the end of every Kalpa, with the Gods and with the spirits, who in the circle of births have raised themselves to the world of the Gods. Indeed, the reorganization of the spirit world goes further still. Already before Buddha, the Brahmans had surmounted the low stand-point of mythological polytheism, and supplanting it by the idea of the Brahman, as the absolute divine or super-divine power. What, then, does Buddha decree? To this Brahman also he assigns a place in his universe. Over and above the world of the Gods with its six paradises, he heaps up sixteen Brahma worlds, not to be attained through virtue and piety, but through inner contemplation, through knowledge and enlightenment. The dwellers in these worlds are already purely spiritualized beings, without body, without weight, without desire, far above men and Gods. Indeed, the Buddhist architect rises to a still more towering height, heaping upon the Brahma-world four still higher worlds, which he calls the world of the formless. All these worlds are open to man, and the beings ascend and descend in the circle of time, according to the works they have performed, according to the truths they have recognized. But in all these worlds the law of change obtains; in none is there exemption from birth, age, and death. The world of the Gods will perish like that of men, even the world of the formless will not last forever; but the Buddha, the Enlightened and truly Free, stands higher, and will not be affected or disturbed by the collapse of the Universe: "Si fractus illabatur orbis, impavidum ferient ruinae."

Now, however, we meet with a vein of irony which one would hardly have expected in Buddha. Gods and Devils he had located; to all mythological and philosophical acquisitions of the past he had done justice as far as possible. Even fabulous beings such as Nāgas, Gandharvas, and Garudas, had escaped the processes of dissolution, which was to reach them later only at the hands of comparative mythology. There is only one idea, — the idea of a personal creator, in regard to which Buddha is relentless.

It is not only denied, but even its origin, like that of an ancient myth, is carefully explained by him in its minutest details. This is done in the Brahma-gā-sūtra as follows: Pray note that a destruction of the worlds occurs at the end of every kalpa, — a destruction which not only annihilates earth and hell, but also all the worlds of the Gods, and even the three lowest of the Brahma-worlds. A description of the duration of a kalpa can only be given in the language of Buddhism. Take a rock of four German cubic miles, touch it once in a hundred years with a piece of fine cloth, and the rock will sooner be reduced to dust than a kalpa will have attained its end. Thus it is said that at the end of the kalpa, after all the lower stories of the universe had been destroyed, and a new world had again been slowly formed, the spirits dwelling in the higher Brahma-worlds had remained inviolate. Then one of these spirits, a being without body, without weight, omnipresent and blessed within himself, descended, when his time had arrived, from the higher Brahma-world to the new formed nether Brahma-world. There he first dwelt alone; but by and by the desire arose in him not to remain alone any longer. At the moment of the awakening of this desire within him, a second being accidentally descended from the higher into the lower Brahma-world. Then and there the thought originated in the first being, "I am the Brahma, the great Brahma, the Highest, the Unconquerable, the Omniscient, the Lord and King of All. I am the Creator of all things, the Father of All. This being has also been created by me; for as soon as I desired not to remain alone, my desire brought forth this second being." The other beings as they gradually descended from the higher worlds likewise believed that the first comer had been their Creator, for was he not older and mightier and handsomer than they?

But this is not all; for although it would explain how one spirit could consider himself the creator of other spirits, it would leave unexplained the circumstances of men on earth believing in such a creator. This is explained in the following manner: "In the course of time one of these higher beings sank lower and lower, and was finally born as a man on earth. There by penances and deep meditation, he attained a state of inner enlightenment, which gives to man the faculty of remembering his former existences. He remembered the above narrated occurrences in the newly originated Brahma-world, and announced to mankind that there was a Creator, a Brahman, who had been prior to all other beings; that this Creator was eternal and immutable, while all beings created by him were mutable and mortal.

There is, I believe, an unmistakable note of animosity in this explanation, otherwise so alien to the character of Buddha, and the question naturally arises whether this can have been the doctrine of the founder of Buddhism himself. And herewith we at once approach our principal problem, — "Is it possible to distinguish between Buddhism and the personal teaching of Buddha?" We possess the Buddhist canon and have a right to consider all that we find in this canon as orthodox Buddhist doctrine. But as there has been no lack of efforts in Christian theology to distinguish between the doctrine of the founder of our religion and that of the writers of the Gospels, to go beyond the canon of the New Testament, and to make the Logos of the Master the only valid rule of our faith, so the same want was already felt at a very early period, among the followers of Buddha. King Asoka, the Indian Constantine, had to remind the assembled priests at the great council which had to settle the Buddhist canon, that what had been said by Buddha that alone was well said. Works attributed to Buddha, but declared as apocryphal, or even as heterodox, already existed at that time.

Thus we are not by any means without an authority for distinguishing between Buddhism and the teaching of Buddha; the question being only, is such a separation practicable for us?

My belief is that all honest inquirers must oppose a No to this question; and even Burnouf never ventured to cast a glance beyond the boundaries of the Buddhist canon. What he finds in the canonical books, in the so-called "Three Baskets," is to him the doctrine of Buddha, similarly as we must accept, as the doctrine of Christ, what is contained in the four Gospels.

Still the question ought to be asked again and again, whether, at least with regard to certain doctrines or facts, it may not be possible to make a step further in advance, even with the conviction that it cannot lead us to results of apodictic certainty. For if, as happens frequently, we find in the different parts of the canon views, not alone differing from, but even contradictory to each other, it follows, I think, that one only of them can belong to Buddha personally, and I believe that in such a case we have the right to choose, and the liberty to accept, that view as the original one, the one peculiar to Buddha, which least harmonizes with the later system of orthodox Buddhism.

As regards the denial of a Creator, or Atheism in the ordinary acceptation of the term, I do not think that any one passage from the books of the Canon known to us, can be quoted which contradicts it, or which in any way presupposes the belief in a personal God or a Creator. All that may be urged are the words said to have been spoken by Buddha at the moment when he became the Enlightened, the Buddha. They are as follows: "Without ceasing shall I run through a course of many births, looking for the maker of this tabernacle, — and painful is birth again and again. But now, maker of the tabernacle, thou hast been seen; thou shalt not make up this tabernacle again. All thy rafters are broken, thy ridge-pole is sundered; the mind, being sundered has attained to the extinction of all desires."

Here in the maker of the tabernacle, i. e. the body, one might be tempted to see a creator. But he who is acquainted with the general run of thought in Buddhism, soon finds that this architect of the house is only a poetical expression, and that whatever meaning may underlie it, it evidently signifies a force subordinated to the Buddha, the Enlightened.

But whilst we have no ground for exonerating the Buddha personally from the accusation of Atheism, the matter stands very differently as regards the charge of Nihilism. The Buddhist Nihilism has always been much more incomprehensible than mere Atheism. A kind of religion is still conceivable, when there is something firm somewhere, when a something, eternal and self-continuous, is recognized, if not out and above man, at least within him. But if, as Buddhism teaches, the soul after having passed through all the phases of existence, all the worlds of the Gods and of the higher spirits, attains finally Nirvāna as its highest aim and last reward, i. e. be comes quite extinct, then religion is not any more what it ought to be, — a bridge from the finite to the infinite, but a trap-bridge hurling man into the abyss, at the very moment when he thought he had arrived at the stronghold of the eternal. According to the metaphysical doctrine of Buddhism, the soul cannot dissolve itself in a higher being, or be absorbed in the absolute substance, as was taught by the Brahmins and other mystics of ancient and modern times. For Buddhism knew not the Divine, the Eternal, the Absolute, and the soul even, as the I, or as the mere Self, the Atman, as called by the Brahmins, was represented in the orthodox Metaphysics of Buddhism as transient, as futile, as a mere phantom.

No person who reads with attention the metaphysical speculations on the Nirvāna contained in the Buddhist Canon, can arrive at any other conviction than that expressed by Burnouf, viz.: That Nirvāna, the highest aim, the summum bonum of Buddhism, is the absolute nothing.

Burnouf adds, however, that this doctrine only appears in its crude form in the third part of the Canon, the so-called Abhidharma, but not in the first and second parts, in the Sūtras, the sermons, and the Vinaya, the ethics, which together bear the name of Dharma or Law. He next points out that, according to some ancient authorities, this entire part of the Canon was designated as "not pronounced by Buddha." These are, at once, two important limitations. I add a third, and maintain that sayings of the Buddha occur in the first and second parts of the Canon, which are in open contradiction to this metaphysical Nihilism.

Now as regards the soul, or the self, the existence of which, according to the orthodox metaphysics, is purely phenomenal, a sentence attributed to the Buddha says, "Self is the Lord of Self, who else could be the Lord?" And again, "A man who controls himself enters the untrodden land through his own self-controlled self." But this untrodden land is the Nirvāna.

Nirvāna certainly means extinction, whatever its later arbitrary interpretations may have been, and seems, therefore, to imply, even etymologically, a real blowing out or passing away. But Nirvāna occurs also in the Brahmanic writings, as synonymous with Moksha, Nirvṛtti, and other words, all designating the highest stage of spiritual liberty and bliss, but not annihilation. Nirvāna may mean the extinction of many things, — of selfishness, desire, and sin, without going so far as the extinction of subjective consciousness. Further, if we consider that Buddha himself, after he had already seen Nirvāna, still remains on earth until his body falls a prey to death; that Buddha appears, in the legends, to his disciples even after his death, it seems to me that all these circumstances are hardly reconcilable with the orthodox metaphysical doctrine of Nirvāna.

What does it mean when Buddha calls reflection the path of immortality, and thoughtlessness the path of death? Buddhaghosha, a learned man of the fifth century, here explains immortality by Nirvāna, and that this was also Buddha's thought is clearly established by a passage following immediately after: "These wise people, meditative, steady, always possessed of strong powers, attain to Nirvāna, the highest happiness." Can this be annihilation? and would such expressions have been used by the founder of this new religion, if what he called immortality had, in his own idea, been annihilation?

I could quote many more such passages did I not fear to tire you. Nirvāna occurs even in the purely moral sense of rest and absence of passion. "When a man can bear everything without uttering a sound," says Buddha, "he has attained Nirvāna." Quiet long-suffering he calls the highest Nirvāna; he who has conquered passion and hatred is said to enter into Nirvāna.

In other passages, Nirvāna is described as the result of just knowledge. There we read: "Hunger or desire is the worst ailment, the body the greatest of all evils; where this is properly known, there is Nirvāna, the greatest happiness."

When it is said in one passage that Rest (Sānti) is the highest bliss, it is said in another that Nirvāna is the highest bliss.

Buddha says: "The sages who injure nobody, and who always control their body, they will go to the unchangeable place (Nirvāna), where, if they have gone they will suffer no more."

Nirvāna is called the quiet place, the immortal place, even simply that which is immortal; and the expression occurs, that the wise dived into this immortal. As, according to Buddha, everything that was made, everything that was put together, passes away again, and resolves itself into its component parts, he calls in contradistinction, that which is not made, i. e. the uncreated and eternal, Nirvāna. He says: "When you have understood the destruction of all that was made, you will understand that which was not made." Whence it appears that even for him a certain something exists, which is not made, which is eternal and imperishable.

On considering such sayings, to which many more might be added, one recognizes in them a conception of Nirvāna, altogether irreconcilable with the Nihilism of the third part of the Buddhist Canon. The question in such matters is not of a more or less, but of an aut-aut. If these sayings have maintained themselves, in spite of their contradiction to orthodox metaphysics, the only explanation, in my opinion is, that they were too firmly fixed in the tradition which went back to Buddha and his disciples. What Bishop Bigandet and others represent as the popular view of the Nirvāna, in contradistinction to that of the Buddhist divines, was, in my opinion, the conception of Buddha and his disciples. It represented the entrance of the soul into rest, a subduing of all wishes and desires, indifference to joy and pain, to good and evil, an absorption of the soul in itself, and a freedom from the circle of existences from birth to death, and from death to a new birth. This is still the meaning which educated people attach to it, whilst Nirvāna suggests rather a kind of Mohammedan paradise or of blissful Elysian fields to the minds of the larger masses.

Only in the hands of the philosophers, to whom Buddhism owes its metaphysics, the Nirvāna, through constant negations, carried to an indefinite degree, through the excluding and abstracting of all that is not Nirvāna, at last became an empty Nothing, a philosophical myth. There is no lack of such philosophical myths either in the East or in the West. What has been fabled by philosophers of a Nothing, and of the terrors of a Nothing, is as much a myth as the myth of Eos and Tithonus. There is no more a nothing than there is an Eos or a Chaos. All these are sickly, dying, or dead words, which, like shadows and ghosts, continue to haunt language, and succeed in deceiving for a while even the healthiest understanding.

Even modern philosophy is not afraid to say that there is a Nothing. We find passages in the German mystics, such as Eckhart and Tauler, where the abyss of the Nothing is spoken of quite in a Buddhist style. If Buddha had said, like St. Paul, "that what no eye hath seen, nor ear heard, neither has entered into the heart of man," was prepared in the Nirvāna for those who had advanced to the highest degree of spiritual perfection, such expressions would have been quite sufficient to serve as a proof to the philosophers by profession that this Nirvāna, which could not become an object of perception by the senses, nor of conception by the categories of the understanding, could be nothing, more nor less than the Nothing. Could we dare with Hegel to distinguish between a Nothing (Nichts) and a Not (Nicht), we might say that the Nirvāna had through a false dialectical process become from a relative Nothing an absolute Not.

This was the work of the theologians and of the orthodox philosophers. But a religion has never been founded by such teaching, and a man like Buddha, who knew mankind, must have known that he could not with such weapons overturn the tyranny of the Brahmins. Either we must bring ourselves to believe that Buddha taught his disciples two diametrically opposed doctrines on Nirvāna, say an exoteric and esoteric one, or we must allow that view of Nirvāna to have been the original view of the founder of this marvellous religion, which corresponds best with the simple, clear, and cautious character of Buddha.

And I have now said all that can be said in vindication of Buddha within the brief time allowed to these discourses. But I should be sorry if you carried away the impression that Buddhism contained nothing but empty, useless speculations; therefore permit me to read to you, in conclusion, a short Buddhist Parable, which will show you Buddhism in a more human form. It is borrowed from a work which will soon appear, and which contains the translation of the Parables used by the Buddhists to obtain acceptance for their doctrines amongst the people. I shall only omit some technical expressions and minor details which are of no importance:—

"Some time after this, Kisāgotami gave birth to a son. When the boy was able to walk by himself, he died. The young girl, in her love for it, carried the dead child clasped to her bosom, and went about from house to house, asking if any one would give her some medicine for it. When the neighbors saw this they said, 'Is the young girl mad that she carries about on her breast the dead body of her son?' But a wise man, thinking to himself, 'Alas! this Kisāgotami does not understand the law of death; I must comfort her,' said to her, 'My good girl, I cannot myself give medicine for it, but I know of a doctor who can attend to it.' The young girl said, 'If so, tell me who it is.' The wise man continued, 'Buddha can give medicine, you must go to him.'

"Kisāgotami went to Buddha, and doing homage to him, said, 'Lord and master, do you know any medicine that will be good for my boy?' Buddha replied, 'I know of some.' She asked, 'What medicine do you require?' He said, 'I want a handful of mustard-seed.' The girl promised to procure it for him, but Buddha continued, 'I require some mustard-seed taken from a house where no son, husband, parent, or slave has died.' The girl said, 'Very good,' and went to ask for some at the different houses, carrying the dead body of her son astride on her hip. The people said, 'Here is some mustard-seed, take it.' Then she asked, 'In my friend's house has there died a son, a husband, a parent, or a slave?' They replied, 'Lady, what is this that you say? The living are few, but the dead are many.' Then she went to other houses, but one said, 'I have lost a son'; another, 'I have lost my parents'; another, 'I have lost my slave.' At last, not being able to find a single house where no one had died, from which to procure the mustard-seed, she began to think, 'This is a heavy task that I am engaged in. I am not the only one whose son is dead. In the whole of the Sāvatti country, everywhere children are dying, parents are dying.' Thinking thus, she was seized by fear, and putting away her affection for her child, she summoned up resolution, and left the dead body in a forest; then she went to Buddha and paid him homage. He said to her, 'Have you procured the handful of mustard-seed?' 'I have not,' she replied; 'the people of the village told me, 'The living are few, but the dead are many.' Buddha said to her, 'You thought that you alone had lost a son; the law of death is that among all living creatures there is no permanence.' When Buddha had finished preaching the law, Kisāgotami was established in the reward of the novitiate; and all the assembly who heard the law were established in the same reward.

"Some time afterwards, when Kisāgotami was one day engaged in the performance of her religious duties, she observed the lights (in the houses) now shining, now extinguished, and began to reflect, 'My state is like these lamps.' Buddha, who was then in the Gandhaku'i building, sent his sacred appearance to her, which said to her, just as if he himself was preaching, 'All living beings resemble the flame of these lamps, one moment lighted, the next extinguished; those only who have arrived at Nibbāna are at rest.' Kisāgotami, on hearing this, reached the stage of a saint possessed of intuitive knowledge."

Gentlemen, this is a specimen of the true Buddhism: this is the language, intelligible to the poor and the sick, which has endeared Buddhism to the hearts of millions,—not the silly, metaphysical phantasmagorias of worlds of Gods and worlds of Brahma, or final dissolution of the soul in Nirvāna,—no, the beautiful, the tender, the humanly true, which, like pure gold, lies buried in all religions, even in the sand of the Buddhist Canon.

AT SCARBOROUGH.

THE broken weather produced a broken season this autumn in most of the watering-places except in those where the system of huge hotels has of late years been successfully imported. There, while houses and lodgings are at a discount, the hotels are full, and when the rest of the town is being deserted the hotel visitors are the last to depart. A huge hotel, such as, for instance, the Grand Hotel at Scarborough, is a little city in itself; it has its walks, lounges, promenades, dances, music, concentrating within its own limits the frivolities of a large population. But then Scarborough is a peculiar place, and the Grand Hotel is its most peculiar institution. It is not so splendidly finished and well established as the more limited Royal Hotel, but then its enormous dimensions and its distinctive character make the question of its eventual success a very interesting problem. It is a little too much of an imitation, a defective imitation, of the Grand Hôtel on the Boulevards, a notion helped by the staff of French waiters, the reproduction of the celebrated Paris dining-room, the system of accounts, and on the whole we are left lagging considerably behind the French model. But it is only the second season, and it may achieve much still. I observed that the Yorkshire people themselves generally go into lodgings, which can be as handsome and expensive as any hotel-rooms, because they belong to family clans and have lots of their own people about them. But people who come from a great distance, or who are solitary, come to huge hotels where there is abundant liveliness and infinite chances of companionship. It is curious to note in how rudimentary a form the acquaintanceship is knocked up, and how duly and prosperously it proceeds. You speak a little to your next-door neighbor, perchance a lady, at the table d'hôte; perchance you settle down into the same proximity at dinner for several successive days; you get first a smile and then a nod. You are at liberty to ask for music and to turn over the music-leaves in the immense drawing-room; you make part in a sail to Whitby or Saltburn, or perhaps in a carriage expedition. The solitude is soon peopled with well-known forms, and even the loneliest man, with a moderate degree of tact and appearance, may find himself part and parcel of a very gay society.

The huge hotel system which has been imported into this country from Paris and New York may have inevitable drawbacks, but I imagine that it meets very exactly the social wants of a place like Scarborough. The table d'hôte system has never taken root in England, but it flourishes exceedingly well here and also at the Pavilion at Folkestone. I must, however, say in candor that the dinner need not be so long and the cookery might be better. People, however, get very hungry at Scarborough and do not eat scientifically. The people at the Grand are acting wisely in getting up a specialty for dancing. Dancing, as one of the fine arts, has been greatly declining in Yorkshire. Harrogate used to be famous for it; there was scarcely a hotel there where there was not dancing night after night, but now there is perhaps only one hotel in the place where the dancing is regularly kept up. They dance a good deal at the Grand. The Royal, and doubtless the other hotels on the South Cliff, have regular balls with their formal cards of admission, but these are rare. At the Grand they get up little balls or dancing parties two or three times a week, when you get what supper you like in the coffee-room with champagne-cup and claret-cup, and the dancing does not last much beyond two in the morning.

I have said that Scarborough has a distinctive character, and that distinctive character is undoubtedly flirtation. It is carried to an amazing height flagrantly and without disguise. Scarborough forms the great hunting-ground of the north. Girls confessedly go there to look up husbands, and men are confessedly looking out for wives. The north of England abounds in heiresses, and they crop up plentifully in Scarborough. Their belongings look very sharply after them, for the Detriments are busy here, loafing about on their narrow incomes, and inquiring diligently into all the variations of the matrimonial market. A huge hotel affords excellent chances of flirtation. There is that public drawing-room, where, when all the world is withdrawn to the Spa, there is abundant solitude in quiet recesses, not to mention the walks that may be achieved in the hall, the corridors and the huge verandas. But for all that the flirtation is not to be carried on so quietly as might be supposed. There is as much gossip in a big hotel as in a small town. Dowagers and others watch each little game most intently and comment on it incessantly. Scarborough society likes a lord, and will allow a great deal to a man of rank. By the way, Scarborough has a lord of its own in the person of the popular Earl of Lonsborough, who has a beautiful place here, where he is about to receive the Prince of Wales. But Scarborough society knows its rights, and thinks a very middle-aged man of title unreasonable if he wants both youth and beauty at once in a bride; he ought to be content with the one or the other. Then gossip and rumor are busy in these vast shadowy halls. That pretty girl is hesitating whether she shall take that young man with two thousand a year or that old fellow with five. Perhaps the old fellow is deliberating whether he will marry the pretty portionless girl or take some more elderly lady with substantial property. It is soon keenly detected and then whispered about in the hotel that such a person "adores" such a lady.

Thenceforward to some it becomes a keen delight to watch the history of this little transaction. It is very remarkable to notice how many elderly men there are in pursuit of young wives at Scarborough. The other night I counted numbers of gray-haired men dancing at a ball, and a graybeard dancing, it must be confessed, is hardly a very pleasing object for contemplation. A business man feels that he must work hard and make "a little pile of his own" before he can seriously think of marriage. And so it comes to pass that in our more industrial counties young men are working while old men are wooing; and it is too much the case that young beauties prefer coin and a carriage to love and a cottage.

The fashionable town has overflowed from the South Cliff to the North Cliff. The North Cliff has the advantage of quietude and novelty, but it is very dull when compared with the South Cliff. This season the new pier has been opened. They have not yet had a band, and the new pier certainly strikes us as being dreary. The fashionable gatherings ought not to make any visitor oblivious of the great natural beauty of the scenery and the picturesqueness of the old town, that borough planted on the rock or scar. The sands are all alive with the happy children playing, with horsemen and horsewomen, with the scarlet postilions on the carriage-horses. Between the Grand Hotel and the jetty the sands are as well worn a track as Newberry Street itself. By the jetty and the lighthouse you see that Scarborough is a not inconsiderable port, and that many fishing-boats start here, boats of pleasure, traffic, and passage. The old town here rather reminds you of Hastings. Between lowly dwellings you go up a very steep street called Church Stairs Street, and very appropriately so, for it is a literal going up of stairs. It is like that steep street of Clovelly which has justly been described as "a cataract of houses." Then you emerge on the wide, desolate churchyard, swept by the northern storms; and you will do well to enter that magnificent old church, with its associations of the battles that wrecked its choir.

Pleasant it is to pace that stupendous headland, where stand the reliquary ruins of the castle, and to look down the sheer precipices, where the sea-bird is flying between you and the wave, and examine the fosses, dykes, and scarped cliffs that remind you of the memorable siege. Across the bay and the ravine rises the opposing height called Oliver's Mount. The Scarborough people say that Oliver Cromwell here planted his cannon against the castle. They are, however, very much at fault in their history, for, as a matter of fact, Oliver Cromwell never "assisted" at the siege of Scarborough. Still, it is very well worth your while to climb up that long succession of terraces that conduct you to the summit of the Mount. There is the best attainable view of Scarborough from here. You see the sea, trending away, north and south, through a succession of points and bays, northwards to the moorlands of Whitby, and southwards to the white chalk cliffs of Flamborough Head, the favorite haunt of those "pilot" seagulls, whose shrill screams warn the mariners from the perilous rocks. On a clear day you may discern Castle Howard from here. It is one of the sights of Scarborough, but, it must be acknowledged, rather remote for a visit. Still, I did it, and thought it worth doing. There is something melancholy, however, in recalling the genius, taste, and activity of the last earl, and contrasting with it that comparative silence and solitude which belong to the rule of the present lord. It is as well that Admiral Howard does for Castle Howard what the lamented Lord Herbert did so long for Wilton. A day amid the statues and pictures, the gardens and woods of Castle Howard is an agreeable interlude for a stay at Scarborough.

But of course the great social charm of Scarborough is the Spa. The people here are simply delirious on the subject of their Spa. They frequent it morning, noon, and night. In my wanderings round the environs I was surprised to see how comparatively few were interesting themselves with the landscapes or with the antiquities. All Scarborough concentrates itself at the Spa. The Spa itself, considered simply as a Spa, is probably not much more than a snare, a mockery, and a delusion. Not one in a thousand cares for the medicated fountains. The Spa is a truly wonderful place. You may have seen all the best watering-places at home, — you may have seen many of the best abroad; but you must own that Scarborough Spa is absolutely unique, inimitable in its way. That cliff bridge, with its sixpenny admission for the whole day, is the most crowded of all thoroughfares. The whole cliff, as far as possible, is planted with hardy trees that can withstand the Norse gales, with masses of ferns and undergrowths, and winding paths through the woods. Then come terraces with flower-beds; and so you descend to the Spa buildings and the long wide terrace in front. Looking up from the terrace on a brilliant morning we see parterres of flowers, and still more bewildering parterres of living beauty. The scene is wonderful at night, especially if it is a moonlight night and the tide is up. Then the sea is plunging close beneath the balustrade, and the terrace is brilliantly lighted, and noble music is crashing, and crowds of men and splendidly attired women are pacing the terraces or wandering in the walks. Perhaps the provincial belles are in their dress a little too gaudy and gauzy, but every now and then you meet with some perfectness of costume that tells of the best society in London and Paris. The "Grecian bend" has not, so far as I have observed, penetrated into Scarborough, but I am told that something which is called the "Alexandra limp" has come into fashion. There is a very fashionable young lady who wears a high-heeled boot on one foot and a low-heeled boot on the other, which is supposed to confer an elegant drawl on the attitude, and to produce a highly effective result. The vagaries of fashion are most curious, and some of the most abnormal specimens may be studied in such a place as Scarborough. I do not wonder that this queen of northern watering-places is such a passionate favorite with the North country folk, and, through the system of railways, with people all over the country. People come here again and again, and think that the year is lost which has not had its six weeks at Scarborough. You may stay later if you like, later than you would have thought possible for the eastern coast, through the earlier winter months, — so pure, bracing, and comparatively mild is the climate, — but when the east winds really set in, then let the narrow-chested beware, and take their swallow flight over the country to nestle beneath the cliffs of Torquay, or to sun themselves by the dark-blue waters that lave the Riviera.

LORD DERBY.

If it cannot be said that Lord Derby was in the highest sense of the word a great statesman, he certainly was a most wonderful man, and he was born to command. He was the most versatile politician of our time. As a debater he was in his best days more than a match for any adversary. Nearly twenty years ago the late Lord Aberdeen, who had heard the old oratorical giants, coupled Lord Derby with Mr. Gladstone as the two best speakers he had ever listened to. The fame of his encounters with O'Connell in his earlier years will long survive; while in more recent years, and until his voice grew thin and husky, a speech of his in the House of Lords was always a marvellous feat, and stamped him as the first of our orators. It was not in mastery of his own language alone that he excelled. His translations from foreign and classical languages would deserve to be remembered, even if he had no other title to a splendid repute. With a strong English character, too, his acquaintance with foreign politics was remarkable, — even minute, and it was no doubt as much through Lord Derby's influence among foreign statesmen as through his own good sense that in the last Tory Government Lord Stanley was enabled to conduct our foreign relations with more than ordinary success. He who was thus prominent as a statesman was not less prominent as a sportsman, and it has often been said, not without truth, that he would have esteemed it a greater triumph to see one of his horses win the Derby than to see his party win on the most important Division. If further proof of his many-sidedness were needed, there is evidence of it in the little volume of Conversations on the Parables, which, as a young man, he wrote for children; and in the further facts that he began life as an ardent Whig, that he passed into a Tory, and that he ended his political career by using all his power to pass a Radical measure of Parliamentary Reform. In nearly all these undertakings he stands out to view with a marked love of combat.

He had a strong fighting instinct, and did not much care what odds he had to contend against. He undertook to administer the Government of England on three several occasions with immense majorities against him; his delight in the Iliad, which he translated, was as much because of the din of battle which pervades it as for the grand style in which the battle is described; and his devotion to the Turf was but one more token of his love of contest. These fighting qualities, conjoined to much brilliancy of manner, a renowned lineage, and great estates, commanded the confidence of a powerful party, even though few victories attended his leadership, and though, notwithstanding his genial social faculty, he kept his followers generally at a distance. In this latter respect there was a contrast between him and his chief rival, Lord Palmerston, — both of them eminently sociable men. Every firm adherent of Lord Palmerston's could boast of a friendly word, perhaps a familiar conversation with his chief, while the rank and file of the Tories could make no such boast of the privileges they enjoyed in Lord Derby's company. In spite of these defects he won the fidelity, the admiration, and even the affection of no mean following, through the manliness of his character, which helped to conceal recklessness of policy and want of political foresight.

No family in the British Empire can show a more flourishing genealogical tree than that of Edward Geoffrey, fourteenth Earl of Derby. It is, perhaps, not much to say that his family is a very old one, though, indeed, the houses whose foundations were laid in the days of the Conqueror are but few. It is, however, something that in the long line of his ancestry there is an unwonted number of strongly marked men. The Earls of Derby were physically of the best breed in the country, — firm of fibre, full of animal vigor, healthy, and long-lived. Mentally, they were strong-willed, high-mettled, lovers of the fray, generous, chivalrous, humorous, balancing their genial instincts with plenty of pride, taming their fiery spirit with a remarkable wariness, often original, sometimes peculiar, and affecting to stand fast by their motto, — Sans changer. We have observed that, noting the peculiarity of the race, a recent writer has pointed it out as a curious coincidence that one of the old titles in the family was that of Lord Strange. But the name of Strange is not to be understood in the modern sense. It is a corruption of Strong, — a much truer epithet. The poets have not failed, indeed, to discover that there is but one word in the English language which rhymes to the name of Stanley. These manly Earls of Derby, Barons and Knights of Stanley, trace the stream of their blood beyond the Conquest, and one of the striking points in their history is that, almost invariably seeking out heiresses as their brides, they dropped their own name, which was at first Aldithley or Audley; on two several occasions, took the names of their Saxon wives; and are now identified with the Saxon family of Stanley, and with the still greater Saxon family of Smith. What renders the point most interesting is that much of the vigor of the race may be attributed to the inexclusive character of their marriages, as, indeed, it will be found in the Peerage generally that in all the lines of long descent the marriages were very mixed, and no great care was taken to preserve the purity of the blood.

The Earldom of Derby, though one of the oldest in the Peerage, has not yet belonged to the House of Stanley for four centuries. This is a fact which may quell one's genealogical zeal until it is remembered that in the English aristocracy the antiquity of family and of title do not always go together. The younger branch of a great family may be ennobled while the elder still belongs to the commoners; and a new family may grasp at a Peerage which a more ancient house would regard as adding but little to its dignity. If Lord Derby's title is not four centuries old, his forefathers may be traced back for double that number of years. They are really, as we have said, a remarkable race, and well worthy of more ample notice than they have received from the writers of family history or than we can now afford to give to them. Suffice it to say, in passing, that the first Earl of Derby is famous in the reign of Henry VII.; that there is another in the reign of Mary, celebrated for his grand style and his princely hospitality; that one in the reign of Elizabeth also made his mark, and finds a place among noble authors; and that yet another, in the reign of Charles I., is still better known, his wife, who defended Lathom House, sharing in his renown. There is another celebrated Earl of Derby, who made a noise at the end of the last century, who was the grandfather of the Earl just dead, who was the boon companion of Charles Fox, who founded the great races of the Derby and the Oaks, and who chose for his second wife the actress, Miss Farren. He lived so late into the present century that when his grandson made his appearance in Parliament, and for some time afterwards, he was known not by any title of courtesy customary to an earl's heir, but as plain Mr. Stanley. The son of this nobleman, through whom the name of Derby in its connection with horses has become famous all over the world, was the thirteenth Earl of the name, lived a retired life, remained to the end of his days constant to the Whigs, and was best known for his devotion to natural history. His zoological collection of living animals at Knowsley was of rare value; he was President of the Linnæan and Zoological Societies; and the records of his scientific work may still be consulted with advantage. In 1798 he married his cousin, daughter of the Rev. Geoffrey Hornby, and his eldest son, the fourteenth Earl of Derby, now deceased, was born at Knowsley on the 29th of March in the following year. Lord Derby, therefore, at his death, was in his seventy-first year.

He is one of the many distinguished men who have been educated at Eton and at Christ Church, Oxford. But in speaking of his education we ought not to forget what he owes to his grandmother, — that is to say, his step-grandmother, who was married to his grandfather only two years before he himself was born. As Miss Farren, she was a very clever actress of high comedy, with not a little distinction of manner, and she bestowed great care on the elocution of the future statesman. Lord Derby as a speaker was remarkable for his natural manner, for his silvery voice, and for the ease with which he managed his breath through the intricate involutions of sentences that seemed to be interminable. By his own clearness of thought he learnt to make those long sentences in wonderfully clear and nervous English, — sentences so long and devious in their course that, listening to them in cool blood, critical hearers were often in expectation that the nominative at the beginning would never find a verb at the end; but they were always disappointed, for the sentences, however long and however involved, always came right at last.

But it was due to Miss Farren that he brought to perfection and made so much of the voice which gave these sentences wing. Its ringing notes can never be forgotten by those who once heard it. This perfection, however, came afterwards. As a youth he might excel in recitations, but he was chiefly remarkable for his love of sport, for his restlessness, for his impulsiveness, and for his scholarship. His career at Christ Church was distinguished, though he left the University without taking a degree. Why he did so it is difficult to understand, as he had great confidence in himself, and never feared a contest of any kind. Among other facts to be mentioned to his honor, it may be stated that he won the Chancellor's prize for Latin verse, the subject being "Syracuse." At the age of twenty-one, when he offered himself as a candidate for the borough of Stockbridge, there were few young men so gifted, so accomplished, or so full of spirit as Mr. Stanley; and the Whigs, who were then in very low estate, regarded him with more than common interest. The party was weak enough throughout the country and in the House of Commons; but it was very weak indeed in the House of Lords and in the list of those who might succeed to it. In this party—which had some reason to despond, and which did despond more than need be—young Stanley excited the greatest hopes. It has been said of him that he was the only brilliant eldest son produced by the British Peerage for a hundred years. This is an exaggeration, but there can be no doubt as to the exceptional character of his abilities, and as to the brilliancy of the promise with which his friends regarded him. They complained of him as not being much of a worker. A year or two later one of his relatives complained that he was always shooting,—shooting, eternally shooting; but, then, he was wonderfully ready, mastered a subject with great rapidity, and held his facts in memory with singular tenacity, so that he could do more work than most men with much less effort.

Although Mr. Stanley entered Parliament in 1821, he did not make his maiden speech until 1824. It was on a Manchester Gas Bill, and it was so remarkable for its clearness and ability that Sir James Mackintosh, who followed him in the debate, devoted the greater part of his speech, as reported in Hansard, to extolling the performance. "No man," he said, "could have witnessed with greater satisfaction than himself an accession to the talents of the House which was calculated to give lustre to its character and strengthen its influence; and this was more particularly a subject of satisfaction to him when he reflected that these talents were likely to be employed in supporting principles which he conscientiously believed to be most beneficial to the country." Mr. Stanley, however, made a still more striking display of oratorical power in speaking somewhat later on a motion of Joseph Hume's with regard to the Irish Church. At the same time this speech did not so well please his political friends, inasmuch as he declared himself unable to support Hume's proposition, which declared "that it is expedient to inquire whether the present Church Establishment in Ireland be not more than commensurate to the service to be performed, both as regards the number of persons employed and the incomes they receive." It is interesting to note that while Mr. Stanley voted against this motion, Lord John Russell voted in favor of it; and that, whereas Lord Russell has now lived to see the policy which he recommended carried out, the last public act of Lord Derby was to protest vehemently against a measure which, when presented to him in the bud five-and-forty years before, it was almost his first public act to resist.

After this it does not appear that Mr. Stanley was much before the public until, in the short-lived Administration of Lord Goderich, he assumed office as Under-Secretary for the Colonies. In the interval he travelled a good deal, visited the United States in company with the present Speaker and the late Lord Taunton, married, and built himself a house upon one of his grandfather's estates in Ireland, where he is described (by an adversary, however) as living "in a style very uncongenial to all Irish notions of living, holding no intercourse with the gentry, but pacing rapidly along the high-road with a elouched hat and a thick staff, and known among the peasants as the 'odd gentleman from England.'" At the same time he changed his seat in Parliament from Stockbridge to Preston. His grandfather had a mansion in Preston, and nearly every house in the town, indeed, belonged to him. So it seemed natural enough that Mr. Stanley should represent it. Yet, strange to say, the people of Preston soon wearied of him. He was not conciliatory, and, stranger still, he contrived to make himself unpopular by refusing to subscribe to the Borough races. It was no part of his Parliamentary duties, he said, to subscribe to races. Therefore, when he was appointed to the Under-Secretaryship of the Colonies in Lord Goderich's Administration, and when he applied to his constituents for re-election, he was opposed, and that successfully, by Henry Hunt, better known as Orator Hunt. The family were very angry; the old Earl pulled down his mansion in the town, which he would never enter again; and it may be supposed that his disappointment did not make young Stanley less eager than before for Parliamentary Reform. Another seat was found for him at Windsor, where Sir Hussey Vivian retired in his favor. It may here be added that he sat for Windsor till 1832; that then he was elected for North Lancashire; and that he continued to represent that constituency till he went to the House of Lords.

Lord Goderich's Government never met Parliament, and Mr. Stanley's remarkable gifts were not fully displayed until, on the accession of Lord Grey to power, he was appointed Secretary for Ireland, the Marquis of Anglesey being Lord-Lieutenant. It was at this time that he made his chief mark as an orator. The people demanded Parliamentary Reform, and Mr. Stanley was one of those most ardent in the cause. There are many still living who speak with enthusiasm of the dash of his unstudied eloquence, both in and out of Parliament. He had all the irresistible impulse of youth, and he had the intense love of battle. He was ready in a moment to harangue a multitude. Up he would get on a chair or a table, and send forth a torrent of declamation that carried all before it. In the House of Commons he was naturally more restrained. Here he had to measure himself in debate with Peel and with the great O, as he was called. O'Connell entered Parliament with a tremendous reputation, and excited not a little fear. He was like the Philistine, Goliath of Gath, come to defy the Senate. Who could withstand him? Surely, not this stripling, Mr. Stanley, with whom O'Connell had begun his acquaintance by calling him in his coarse style contemptuous names. Mr. Stanley liked nothing better than a fight, and was quite willing to meet O'Connell on equal terms. He went into the contest with the zest of a pugilist. He spoke of O'Connell in those days as a "heavy weight," and of his encounters with him as "rounds"; and the universal opinion is that in these "rounds" the great Irishman, notwithstanding his eloquence, came off second best. Indeed, O'Connell soon learnt to hold the Irish Secretary in salutary awe, and showed his feeling in that respect by taunting Mr. Stanley with his haughtiness and scornful bearing. In reference to these taunts Sir Robert Peel made a pointed remark. "Often," he said, "have I heard the right honorable gentleman taunted with his aristocratic demeanor. I rather think I should hear fewer complaints on that score if he were a less powerful opponent in debate." This tribute of praise from the leader of the opposite party may be taken as proof of a success which could not be gainsaid.

Mr. Stanley was then, indeed, the chief delight of St. Stephen's, and it was the great Parliamentary pastime of the period to hear him and the burly Irish demagogue attack and reply to each other, — O'Connell, with his broad humor and his fervid passion, — humor and passion, however, which were more effective with a popular than with a senatorial audience, — Mr. Stanley, with his more delicate wit, his stinging retorts, and his straight-hitting arguments. Nothing was more remarkable than the contrast between the man and the orator. In private he was playful as a kitten, restless as a child, and one might wonder how such a big boy could ever be a sober statesman. On the other hand, when he got up to speak he was collected and calm, at least, as calm as any one can be in the passion of oratory, and there was, with all its boyish glee, an unexpected stateliness and rhythm in his style and fashion of address. Then, again, when he sat down, — we are speaking of his earlier days, — he would relapse into restlessness, now resting his feet in queer places, perhaps on a table, and now suddenly, as he felt the blow from an adversary curling them under his seat, and moving about.

Be his style, however, what it might, he was the delight of his friends, the terror of his foes, and the admiration of all. The best description of him is to be found in the verses of Lord Lytton, — in his poem of the New Timon. Lord Lytton probably felt that in this poem he did but scant justice to the powers of O'Connell, and therefore in another effort of his muse, devoted entirely to the oratory of St. Stephen's, he endeavored with characteristic candor to repair the wrong, writing as follows: —

"But not to Erin's coarser chief deny,
Large if his faults, time's large apology;
Child of a land that ne'er had known repose,
Our rights and blessings, Ireland's wrongs and woes;
Hate at St. Omer's into caution drilled,
In Dublin law-courts subtilized and skilled;
Hate in the man, whatever else appear
Fickle or false, was steadfast and sincere;
But with that hate a nobler passion dwelt,
To hate the Saxon was to love the Celt.
Had that fierce railer sprung from English sires,
His creed a Protestant's, his birth a squire's,
No blander Pollio, whom our Bar affords,
Had graced the woolpack and cajoled My Lords.
Pass by his faults, his art be here allowed,
Mighty as Chatham, give him but a crowd;
Hear him in Senates, second-rate at best,
Clear in a statement, happy in a jest;
Sought he to shine, thine certain to displease;
Tawdry, yet coarse-grained, tinsel upon frieze;
His Titan strength must couch what gave it birth, Hear him to mobs and on his mother earth!"

Of O'Connell's great adversary, this is what

Lord Lytton says, not, however, confining his description to the splendid encounters of Mr. Stanley's youth: —

"One after one the lords of time advance —
Hark Stanley meets — how Stanley scorns, the glances!
The brilliant chief, irregularly great,
Frank, haughty, rash — the Rupert of Debate!
Nor govt nor toll his freshness can destroy,
And time still leaves all Eton in the boy;
First in the class and keenest in the ring,
He saps like Gladstone and he fights like Spring.
Ev'n at the feast his pluck pervades the board,
And dauntless gamecocks symbolize their lord.
Lo where atill at friend — if barred from foe —
He scours the ground and volunteers the blow,
And, tired with conquest over Dan and Suob,
Plants a sly bruiser on the nose of Bob;
Decorous Bob, too friendly to reprove,
Suggests fresh fighting in the next remove,
And prompts his chum, in hopes the vein to cool,
To the prim benches of the upper school.
Yet who not blazes with delighted smile
To the pure Saxon of that silver style?
In the clear style a heart as clear is seen,
Prompt to the rash — revolting from the mean."

In 1833 Mr. Stanley left the Irish Office and became Secretary of State for the Colonies, an office which he also afterwards filled under Sir Robert Peel. Of his Colonial administration there is but one thing to be said, — that under him slavery was abolished. This was a great and good work to do, and he entered heart and soul into it; yet he had so little to claim in the origination of this policy and in preparing the mind of the country for it that his name is not often remembered in connection with it. We are much more apt to think of the achievement as the work of Brougham and Wilberforce and Clarkson. It belongs, however, to Mr. Stanley's Administration of the Colonies, and when people ask, "What has he done? what great beneficial measure has he carried?" this must be set down to his account. With regard to his Colonial administration in other respects, the most we can say is, that there is nothing to say about it. But considering the circumstances, that is, after all, saying a good deal. Lord Derby was a man without many ideas in statesmanship. Give him a cause to fight, and he would fight like a hero. Give him an idea to express, and he could express it with great force and defend it with uncommon animation. But he was in statesmanship what he was in literature. He could not originate, he could only translate, he could only transmute. He found the Colonies in existence, and he found a policy at the Colonial Office. He could adopt that policy, and he administered it with skill.

But unfortunately for his reputation, the time had arrived when a new policy was necessary, when the Colonies had become so developed that some change was demanded in their relations with the mother country. It was not in the Mr. Stanley of Lord Grey's Administration, nor in the Lord Stanley of Sir Robert Peel's, to originate the change. Sir William Molesworth and his followers might cry aloud in the streets, and in the House of Commons; but theirs was a new idea, which had to make its way, and which had not yet found an entrance into the exceedingly quick yet unoriginate mind of Lord Derby. So it happens that of his Colonial policy, as a whole, we have nothing to say.

In this reference, however, to his Colonial policy we have touched on a remarkable fact, — namely, that Lord Stanley, having begun his political career as a Whig, had veered round to the Tories, and at length took office under Peel. In 1834 he separated himself from the Whigs on the question of the Irish Church, — he, with Sir James Graham, the Duke of Richmond, and others, resisting the proposed appropriation of its surplus revenues to purposes of education. He lived to see the Irish Establishment entirely swept away, and no one was more strenuous than he in opposition to that reform. In judging of the course taken by a statesman so impulsive in temper and so hot in debate as Lord Derby, we have to look to his training for the origin of much in his conduct. His mother was the daughter of a clergyman, and he himself began his public life by writing an exposition of the Parables for children. Lord Derby was one of those men who can rarely get beyond what has been instilled into them. It was much the same in the matter of the Corn Laws. He was a handsome likeness of his grandfather, whose love of sport he inherited.

This grandfather did not die till 1834, when his grandson was 35 years of age. Is it to be supposed that Lord Derby imbibed nothing from his grandfather but addiction to sport? Nobody more heartily than the celebrated cockfighting Earl joined Fox in his opposition to the Free Trade schemes of Pitt, who had studied Adam Smith and was a convert to his views. Fox was dead against the French Commercial Treaty of Pitt, just as Lord Derby was dead against the French Commercial Treaty of Mr. Gladstone. And Lord Derby, therefore, when he resisted the Free Trade proposed by Sir Robert Peel, was but observing the traditions of his house. In 1834, when he resisted the Appropriation Clause, and in 1846, when he refused to join Peel in the repeal of the Corn Laws, he was only proving his incapacity to get beyond the influence of early education.

Lord Stanley, we have said, left office and the Whigs in 1834, carrying with him several friends, of whom the most able was Sir James Graham. It was with reference to this secession that O'Connell, in his most humorous manner, twitching his wig and rolling his eye, quoted the couplet after which H. B. made one of his best sketches: —

"Still down thy steep, romantic Ashbourne, glides
The Derby Dilly with its six innades."

The secession of the Derby Dilly put a stop for the time to all schemes for the appropriation of the funds of the Irish Church; and in the end, also, the Derby Dilly found its way into the Tory camp. On the fall of Lord Melbourne's first Ministry, indeed, when Peel in 1834 attempted to form a Government, he made overtures to Lord Stanley and his friends, which were rejected. Seven years later, when Lord Melbourne's Ministry could no longer resist the outcry of public opinion, and when Sir Robert Peel for the second time undertook to form a Government, these overtures were renewed and were accepted, Lord Stanley was a tower of strength to the Tory party, though he was much too independent, and too willing to smite friends as well as foes, to make its leader feel perfectly at ease with him. Sir Robert Peel was glad of an excuse to raise Lord Stanley before his time to the Upper House, and he had good reason for his distrust.

There came a time when the repeal of the Corn Laws could not be delayed. If Lord Stanley could have seen his way to stand by Peel in that emergency and to accept Free Trade, the Tory party would never have been broken up, for those who might still shout for Protection had no chief of name and influence enough to hold them together. But in that great crisis Lord Stanley was bound by all the traditions of his family to resist Free Trade. His hereditary antipathy to the proposed change had no counterpoise in any personal sympathy with his political chief. His intellect was too playful to sympathize with the earnestness of such men as Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Gladstone. He could be grave when occasion required; but gravity rather bored him, and one may be allowed to doubt whether in his secret heart the awful solemnity and pompous verbosity of Peel's style when he was in a difficulty did not appear to him as something verging on humbug, just as at a later period he had no patience and little regard for the elaborate scrupulosity of Mr. Gladstone. The result in the great conjuncture of 1846 was that Lord Stanley broke loose from the sway of Peel. The rank and file of the Tories rallied round Lord Stanley; Peel fell never to rise to office again; and his immediate followers gradually went over to the opposite party.

This was the turning-point of Lord Stanley's career, for he was soon formally and by the advice of the Duke of Wellington installed in the leadership of the Tories. It may have been observed that there was unusual formality in the transfer of the leadership of the party from Sir Robert Peel to Lord Stanley, and that Lord Stanley showed unusual reluctance to accept a responsibility which no other man could possibly have undertaken with success. Why this formality? Why this reluctance? The fact is that the position of Lord Stanley was one of considerable delicacy, inasmuch as he was born and bred a Whig, and his alliance with the Tories was of very recent origin. If Lord Stanley had been a Tory from the first, there could have been no difficulty as to his at once stepping into the vacant place. His claims were pre-eminent, by reason of his vast influence and his unrivalled ability. The question was, How could he who had forsaken the Whig ranks but twelve years before, and who had joined the Tory ranks but five or six years before, assume the command of a party in which he might be regarded as a kind of alien? Would the Tories accept the leadership of their convert? The Duke of Wellington, therefore, came forward in the most authoritative manner to decide the question and to gazette Lord Stanley to the lead of his party.

That party was now little better than a forlorn hope. It was weak in its numbers and discredited in its aims. It was, indeed, almost a laughing-stock in the country. In Parliament there was a tremendous force arrayed against it, strong, not merely in numbers, but also in the ability, the experience, and the repute of the statesmen who were at the head of it. Lord Stanley, however, found in Lord George Bentinck and Mr. Disraeli lieutenants of great courage and force of character, men who could fight a losing battle with skill and keep the party together. They held on and fought manfully against overwhelming odds and every kind of disappointment, until at the end of six years they actually found their way into Downing Street.

They did so, however, not through their own strength, but through the dissensions of their adversaries. Those adversaries were many and powerful, but there was no one among them who was allowed to have commanding influence. In point of fact, Lord Palmerston, who was really the strongest man among them, and who in the end rose to supreme power, was then the object of not a little distrust, was attacked on all sides, and was eventually ejected from office. He took a speedy revenge by turning out those who had turned him out. By these dissensions of their chiefs the Whigs were disorganized, and Lord Derby—who had succeeded to his title in 1851—was, in 1852, commanded by the Queen to form a Government. Although supported in the House of Commons only by a hopeless minority, he was courageous enough to undertake the duty imposed upon him, and made up a Cabinet of men almost all of whom were then new to their work, and some of them almost unknown. They tasted the sweets of office for a few months, but that was all. In these few months they were compelled to accept the policy of Free Trade, in opposition to which they had been banded together. In these few months, also, the opposing chiefs came to terms with each other, agreed to sink their differences, and to join in a coalition of “all the talents” under the rule of Lord Aberdeen.

Lord Derby and his friends, therefore, had very soon again to re-apse into the cold shade of Opposition. Unfortunately for them, not only were the “big battalions” against them; but also they had no policy that could be plainly put forward—all their policy was “looming in the future.” The leaders of the party were in their own minds liberal enough; but they dared not speak what they believed, for the main body of the party were obstinate and obstructive.

It must have been a relief to Lord Derby when he resigned the seals of office, held on such terms as he had been compelled to accept. He had gained this, however, by his year of office,—that he had brought a certain number of men into training, that he had shown them to be capable of routine work, and that he had placed them before the country as possible Ministers. He had now to bide his time in Opposition again, encouraging his followers by attacks, by great field days, and by the usual watchfulness of political warfare. The chief burden of this work, of course, fell upon Mr. Disraeli in the House of Commons; but Lord Derby also bore his share of the burden through five more years of Opposition, at the end of which time he was again enabled to comfort his party with the spoils of office. It was still as before, however, through the dissensions of the opposite party, and not through the strength of his own following, that he was able to install them in Downing Street. Lord Aberdeen had retired, and Lord Palmerston was in power, but not yet with such absolute devotion from his party as he afterwards received. There were still mutineers among them, and one day, on account of his supposed subservience to France, they turned upon him and, with the assistance of the Tories, placed him in a minority which forced him to resign. Lord Derby, himself in a minority, accepted office in his place, and succeeded in forming a Ministry which was less weak than the one he had collected in 1852. A Ministry which could boast of such men as Lord Derby himself, Mr. Disraeli, Sir Edward Lytton, Lord Stanley, General Peel, Sir Hugh Cairns, Lord Robert Cecil, Sir John Pakington, Sir Stafford Northcote, could not well be described as wanting in Liberal ideas.

What it most wanted was to secure the support of Mr. Gladstone, who just then hung loose from party and represented, if not in numbers, yet in weight, a neutral party of not a little power which would go far to turn the scales in a Division. Mr. Gladstone declined to join Lord Derby's Cabinet; but he was not hostile to it, and he accepted a proposal made to him by Sir Edward Lytton, then at the Colonial Office, that he should undertake a special mission to the Ionian Islands. It is generally supposed that this evidence of good-will might have been nurtured into a closer alliance between Mr. Gladstone and the Tory party; but Lord Derby had as little sympathy with Mr. Gladstone as with Sir R. Peel; he could not help making a poor jest about the fruitlessness of that mission to Greece; and Mr. Gladstone was lost to the Tories forever. Still, the Government was more than respectable, and all that it wanted for success was a majority. One thing is especially to be noted about it, and that is the presence in the Cabinet of a father and son, the father being Lord Derby himself, the son being the heir to his titles and a statesman of proved ability. It was a most extraordinary combination, but it may be doubted whether the father had a more perfect sympathy with the grave sobriety of the son than with the pompousness of Sir R. Peel or the terrible earnestness of Mr. Gladstone.

The Tory Ministry of 1858—59 made a good fight. In face of considerable resistance they carried their India Bill, by which the government of our most splendid dependency was transferred from the East India Company to the Sovereign; and in a most memorable debate on Lord Canning's Indian policy they completely routed their adversaries. Not only was Lord Derby's Government successful in its Indian policy, but in other respects also it made its mark. Thus the Colonial administration of Sir Edward Lytton showed a vigorous originality which gave great satisfaction; and the attempt of Mr. Disraeli to carry a measure of Parliamentary Reform, although it was unsuccessful, has extorted the praise even of his opponents. The House of Commons rejected this scheme, and the country, when it was appealed to, failed to give it support. But the real reason why Lord Derby's Government was displaced in 1859 was the condition of affairs abroad. It was the year of the Italian war; we seemed to be threatened with disturbance on all sides; questions of the utmost complication and of immense importance were pending; and it was felt to be of paramount necessity that the statesman who had shown most power to deal with foreign States and Courts should have the helm in his hands.

Our representatives might talk and divide on questions of home politics, such as that of Parliamentary Reform; but before and behind all was one dominant thought of the time, that our foreign relations needed the chief attention, and that Lord Palmerston should be at the head of affairs. Lord Palmerston came into power; held it easily for the remainder of his life, and was followed in office by Lord Russell. For seven long years the Tories languished in the wilderness; and if at length they got their reward, it was once more not through their own strength, but through the disorganization of the enemy bereft of its great leader.

In the seven years' interval Lord Derby began to show signs of advancing age. It was not in his mind, indeed, that he showed signs of decay, but in his frame. His walk became less elastic; his voice lost much of its wonderful tone; we began to hear often of severe illness; and it was understood that he was disinclined to enter again upon the toils of office. Still, he was willing to sacrifice himself to his party, and was always ready to take his share of work on any battle-day. No one joined more earnestly than he, for example, in the struggles of his party with Mr. Gladstone when the French Treaty, with the financial questions relating to it, was under discussion. His speech on the repeal of the Paper Duty was a wonder in its way, — a marvel of felicitous statement and clear arrangement of financial details; but it could give those who heard it no adequate idea of his old style, — its music, its fire, its rapidity, its irresistible dash. It may be regarded, also, as a sign of age, though certainly not of decay, that he now reverted much to his books and to the studies of his youth. He set himself the task of translating the Iliad. He had been fond of translation in his youth, and had cultivated the art with some success, as a recent collection of his minor translations from various languages — Greek, Latin, Italian, and French — abundantly proves. And now, in his old age, the brilliant chief returned to his classical studies, and found that he could bear his gout better in company with the Greeks. That he should undertake the translation of Homer shows that he had lost nothing of his old self-confidence, and it cannot be denied that this confidence was justified. The translation is full of spirit; does honor both to Lord Derby's scholarship and to his poetical faculty; and we can well believe that it gave him great delight in its progress. He took as much interest in it as a boy author; liked to have it criticised, and enjoyed praise of his work. The work had been a labor of love to him, and he felt that he had been successful in it. We are not going to make invidious comparisons, nor to say that it supersedes other translations; but it was a work of which he had reason to be proud, which scholars may consult with advantage, and which those who like translations will always read with pleasure.

The later events of Lord Derby's career are so recent that a word about them will be enough. He led his party into power in the summer of 1866; during the next year the great Tory Chief induced his followers to pass an Act establishing Household Suffrage, and early in the following one he resigned the direction of his Government and of his party to Mr. Disraeli, himself retiring very much into private life, and content to serve rather as an adviser than as a commander of the Tory host. In this new position, only one year after he had resigned his command, he saw a strange thing happen, — the House of Lords on a question of high policy voting one way and he himself voting another. It is possible that had he continued to lead his party he would have voted for the second reading of the Irish Church Bill, but having resigned the command he was more free to vote according to his wishes.

Lord Derby's leadership of the Tory party, which extended over twenty-one years, shows two things very clearly, — one, that never was the leader of a great party so wanting in a declared policy; the other, that never was the leader of a great party so implicitly trusted. If we ask what is Tory policy, we are told that it is Conservative. But such men as Mr. Disraeli and Lord Stanley know well that a policy of mere conservatism is inert and incapable of continuance. There never was a greater mistake committed by a party than when the Tories took the word from Sir Robert Peel and called themselves Conservatives. Thenceforth they were tied down to the one principle of standing still. Mr. Disraeli saw the mistake, and it has been a constant habit of his to call his party Tories and not Conservatives. But the party, as a whole, is conscious likely to forget that it is Conservative, its opponents take care to remind them of it. They are Conservative, and yet the business of active legislation is to reform. In opposition, therefore, they are sincere, for their efforts are all Conservative. The moment they get into office they are bound to legislate, and legislation is nothing if it does not improve and reform. Again and again Lord Derby has induced his party to throw their principles to the winds; to accept measures which they would fain rescind, and to propose measures which they have spent their lives in resisting. The way in which Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli combined to induce the party in 1867 to pass a measure of Radical Reform making the Parliamentary franchise depend on household suffrage, was miraculous. Mr. Disraeli boasted of having "educated" his party.

But what was the nature of their education? It was simply this, — they had been taught by severe experience and many bitter disappointments that they as a body were very dull; while it was impossible to deny that Lord Derby and his lieutenants were very clever. In other words, it had been drilled into them by events that they must distrust themselves and trust their leaders. They really did not know what was the Tory policy. It was supposed to be Conservative, but Conservative it was not. It was a mystery. It was all uncertainty. But there was Lord Derby, and he must know. Who was half so clever as Lord Derby? Who was such a good speaker as he? He who could at once translate Greek and manage a racing stud, who led the House of Lords and owned half Liverpool and the whole town of Bury, and who in his fourth score of years had all the playfulness of a schoolboy, was to the British Tory superhuman. Certainly, there was in this brilliant man of many gifts, of rare accomplishments, of splendid lineage, and of immense wealth the very stuff that, conjoined to his own self-confidence, his straightforward style, and his unfailing vivacity, should command submission. Submission was the more readily yielded because his style of command was not arrogant. He was carelessly and naturally playful. To see him in private it often seemed as if he had nothing to do but to be merry. His style was so natural that it became easy to yield to it; and no great party in the present century has yielded such perfect submission for such a length of time to one man as the Tories gave to their splendid chief, who won all the more confidence inasmuch as he never seemed to calculate, but to move straight on with the heroic force of impulse.

We have spoken of Lord Derby chiefly as a statesman. But, after all, it is the man — ever brilliant and impulsive — that has most won the admiration of his countrymen. He was a splendid specimen of an Englishman, and whether he was engaged in furious debate with demagogues, or in lowly conversation on religion with little children, or in parley with jockeys, while training Toxophilite, or rendering Homer into English verse, or in stately Latin discourse as the Chancellor of his University, or in joyous talk in a drawing-room among ladies whom he delighted to chaff, or in caring for the needs of Lancashire operatives, there was a force and a fire about him that acted like a spell. Of all his public acts none did him more honor and none made a deeper impression on the have just alluded, — his conduct on the occasion of the cotton famine in Lancashire. No man in the kingdom sympathized more truly than he with the distress of the poor Lancashire spinners, and, perhaps, no man did so much as he for their relief. It was not simply that he gave them a princely donation; he worked hard for them in the committee which was established in their aid; he was, indeed, the life and soul of the committee, and for months at that bitter time he went about doing good by precept and example, so that myriads in Lancashire now bless his name. He will long live in memory as one of the most remarkable, and indeed irresistible, men of our time, — a man privately beloved and publicly admired, who showed extraordinary cleverness in many ways; was the greatest orator of his day, and was the most brilliant, though not the most successful, Parliamentary leader of the last half-century.

HENRY PARRY LIDDON AND ANGLICAN ORATORY.

WHAT is the exact position which preaching at the present day occupies in the "world and the church"? The critics and cynics say that the noun substantive "sermon" is the most dreary and repellent of all noun substantives, and, as a rule, society is very much disposed to indorse such an expression of opinion. When the silly season of the "Times" sets in, laymen often seem disposed to repay to the clergy a titling of those denunciations under which they themselves have groaned. One such writer ingeniously suggests that the sounding-board of the pulpit should be constructed like an extinguisher, and by a process of machinery should descend upon the pastor's head at the end of twenty-five minutes. Another considerably proposes that Westminster Abbey should be handed over to the permanent use of Mr. Spurgeon. Another insists that sermons should be confined to ten minutes; that it should be allowable to the congregation to withdraw before they commence; or, happiest expedient still, that the effete institution of sermons should be totally abolished. We believe that this is the object practically sought by those who would assign very curt limitations to the sermon. The question of short sermons is, however, distinct from the doctrine of no sermons at all.

The clergy sometimes, but much too rarely, preach very short sermons indeed, and we do not see why the practice should not be indefinitely extended. The Abbé Mullois, who is a great authority in France on such matters, argues that sermons of seven minutes' duration might suffice in a very great number of instances. Some of Dean Stanley's sermons — take the volume of those which he preached before the Prince of Wales — can be read in three minutes, and could be heard in five. Archdeacon Denison says that his sermon never exceeds ten minutes. Some of Mr. Kingsley's sermons are hardly a shade longer. The sermons preached in college chapel — sometimes and with too much reason called "commonplaces" — rarely if ever exceed ten minutes, and if they did there would probably be a college row. It would be a great accommodation to the public if a list of London churches could be issued where it would be guaranteed that the length of the sermon should not exceed from seven to ten minutes. We suspect that those churches would be much better attended than those where the incumbents slip over their half-hour. In fact, there is hardly any limit to the possible brevity which may belong to the sermon. If the divine simply wishes to make a little exhortation or give some sound religious advice, he can do so in a very brief space, sometimes the briefer the better. We have heard of a sermon which was hardly any longer than its text. The preacher took the wise saying in the Proverbs about giving to the poor and lending to the Lord, and then only said, "My brethren, you have heard the terms of the loan, if you like the security, come down with your money." This veracious anecdote closes with the assertion that the collection which ensued was of the most triumphant description. But while a merely practical or hortatory discourse might be included within a very few minutes, it is obvious that a line of argument or a course of instruction would require an ampler allowance of time.

It is also generally asserted — with a solid substratum of truth — that the length of a sermon is in inverse proportion to its excellence. The clever remark of Dr. South is continually being repeated, that he had written a long sermon because he had not time to write a short one. There are limits, however, even to the power of condensation. Not even Dr. South could materially abridge a proposition of Euclid's or the Binomial Theorem. It would perhaps be about as difficult to abridge Butler or Barrow. A great deal of time is unnecessarily consumed in extemporary preaching and perhaps an equal amount by extemporary writing. Perhaps, if we could venture to be generous and candid, it would not be difficult to show that a portion of the blame might equally be divided between the preachers and the public. The public can stand contentedly a frightful amount of twaddle in parliament, on the platform, and in the law-courts, but they are utterly intolerant of what they may choose to consider half an hour's twaddle in the pulpit. We are bound to say that we never, or at least very rarely, hear downright twaddle talked in the pulpit. We get much verbiage, poor illustrations, thin, inconsequent reasonings; or sometimes the discourse is a mere cento of heats, with desultory, ill-arranged remarks thereon.

But the sermon has generally a meaning and always a good purpose, and it is odd if there is no crumb at all worth carrying away. We are afraid that George Herbert's old-fashioned consolation will hardly in these days be accepted; that if we get a lesson in patience, and the benediction that comes at the end of the sermon, we have hardly lost our pains. The reason of the weariness felt frequently is that people really do not care about the subject-matter of the sermon. It is like picture-criticism for those who do not care for pictures, or music-criticism for those who do not care for music. In many congregations many persons resemble school-boys puzzling over authors whose meaning they do not understand. Such persons are not the best judges of the limit of time within which a preacher should confine himself. The instances of the University sermons, both at Oxford and Cambridge, sufficiently prove that it is possible for pulpit orators to rivet the attention of cultivated audiences for upwards of an hour. We do not mention the case in Scotland, which we confess imperfectly to comprehend, — where congregations consider themselves defrauded if they get off with much less than that time. Without in the least degree vindicating the use of long sermons, and thinking strongly that most sermons might well be abbreviated, we believe that there are circumstances and conditions under which long sermons could hardly be avoided, and in the interests of public education it is undesirable that they should.

A contrast is sometimes drawn between the French and English pulpit very much to the disadvantage of the latter. We noticed such a contrast in a recent number of the Pall Mall. The French carefully avoid the error of mixing up preaching, alms, and the confessional. They choose their best men for preaching, and assign them, temporarily, positions in which they are to do their very best. Hence we get the Conferences and such brilliant examples as Père Felix and Lacordaire. The French preacher makes preaching his business, and he does it well. The English preacher has an infinite variety of other business to do, and he does it execrably. He resembles the hero of the Homeric fragment:—

"Many things he did, but none he did well, Blame the gods made neither a fisher nor a hunter."

He is obliged, on every hebdomadal occasion, whatever his inner feelings may be, to be devotional and hortatory. He has to give the inevitable sermon, in the conventional manner, at the regulation length. He has not got the moral courage to limit his sermons to ten minutes, if that will include all that he has really got to say, or to confess himself unprepared and read aloud the sermon of some better man, or to have a system of exchange with neighboring clergymen, which would enable him to write fewer and better sermons. The clergyman is surrounded with many secular influences: he is frequently little better than a relieving officer. He has to carry tracts to old women and play at croquet with young ladies. In fact, he is always fetching and carrying, after the fashion of a tame poodle. He has little time for that broad, generous culture which is necessary for excellence in any special culture. He who knows nothing but theology will be a very poor theologian indeed. Yet, after all, we are by no means disposed to admit that the real superiority rests with the French preacher; we question if the services at Nôtre Dame and the Madeleine are better attended than those at the Abbey and at St. Paul's Cathedral, although in these the same discrimination in the choice of preachers does not seem to exist, neither is the same high standard of excellence maintained. The churches in France are practically given over to women and children, but this is not yet the case in our own country. The country church is still filled by all the respectable families of a neighborhood. Dean Hook mentions some sharp fellow who was in the habit of making himself extremely witty in the periodicals at the expense of the clergy; but finding an opportunity of convincing himself of his own utter incompetence for public speaking, has since repentantly declared that he will never do so again.

The Saturday Review has occupied its readers with an appalling enumeration of the number of sermons preached every week in England. After stating the average number of thousands it proceeds to meditate on the frightful amount of bad preaching, verbiage, and wasted power suggested by such statistics. It would be easy, however, to give a much more appalling calculation. Only imagine the immense number of dinners that are cooked every day in the British Isles, with the waste, excess, and bad cookery connected with them. Yet it would not be easy to convince an Englishman that he ought to omit a dinner in order to lessen that appalling average. In the same way so rooted is the sermon in popular habits that it would not be easy to induce the average congregation to do without it. Moreover, as a man cannot recollect any particular day what he had for dinner, but is quite sure that the dinner did him good, so the average Christian, though he cannot recollect what the sermon was about, is sure that it was a good influence that helped to keep him in good ways.

Yet it may be admitted that in several respects the influence of the pulpit is a declining influence. Popular preaching is not now what it once was. We remember the time when everybody seemed to have a pet parson and a pet doctor. But now there is a great deal of unbelief both in parsons and in doctors. We remember the time when it was popularly said that Mr. Melvill, Dr. McNeile, and Canon Stowell were the three greatest orators of the Anglican Church. Yet no one now goes out into the wilderness—that is, to Barnes—to hear Mr. Melvill; and we have heard the late Canon Stowell almost hooted down by an unsympathizing clerical audience; and we confess we have listened with considerable disappointment to the "great and good" McNeile. It may be said, and with truth, that the men had changed from what they had once been. But the times have changed also. Mr. Melvill's gorgeous mannerism, with its rhetoric and its ornamentation, is now out of date. Mr. Melvill has much better merits than these, and we have no doubt but future critics will seek for the best specimens of pulpit eloquence in volumes of his sermons. They contain passages absolutely unsurpassed in English literature for eloquence and force. But the public taste now prefers a simpler, rugged, and more sincere style. When Melvill used to preach, the church or chapel would be absolutely besieged. The steps of the altar and the pulpit stairs would be covered with clustering human zoöphytes, and the orator could scarcely make his way to and from the vestry. There is no copyright in sermons, and an enterprising publisher would print Mr. Melvill's as fast as they were delivered. We have seen similar scenes in Scotland when Mr. Caird, years ago now, would leave his Highland parish to preach in Glasgow or Edinburgh. Such scenes are now very rarely paralleled in England. Cheap literature has had a very great deal to do with this. A hundred subjects of intellectual interest are now generally discussed, and in London life these subjects are treated with peculiar intensity. If you would wish to know what the full power of the sermon can be, you should observe it in dissenting congregations in Wales and Cornwall. There they like their sermons hot and strong, and they certainly get them hot and strong. The sermon is there everything to a highly excitable and imaginative people,—poetry, literature, gossip, criticism, the drama, and what not. It is the one great intellectual stimulus of the week. Their cravings for intellectual pleasure can hardly be satisfied in any other way than this. Londoners have hardly got an idea of all that a sermon may be capable of being and effecting.

Yet surely Mr. Liddon might give them such an idea. We have heard Dean Stanley remark—and we fully indorse the remark—that he is the greatest preacher of the age. But it is not too much to say that if Mr. Liddon were not recognized as a great orator, he would be more widely acknowledged to be a great writer. He contradicts the shallow criticism that the great objection to the sermon is the objection on the score of length.

Whoever goes to hear Mr. Liddon preach makes up his mind that he is going to listen to a sermon of at least an hour's duration. "On the evening of Good Friday, last year, 1868, the author heard the Rev. A. P. Liddon, at St. Paul's, and listened to him with unabated interest for an hour and twenty minutes." Thus writes Mr. Binney, an eminent Nonconformist minister, who has himself written a volume of sermons or essays of a very high degree of excellence. Moreover, his sermons are by means of that merely hortatory character which might wisely be compressed within a few minutes, albeit, by weak preachers they are often spun out to any conceivable limits. We observe that when Mr. Liddon comes to publish his sermons, he includes some passage or other within brackets, as being necessarily omitted at the time of delivery.

Mr. Liddon draws together such an audience as rarely excites the interests or anxiety of an orator. The announcement that he is to preach anywhere is one that widely excites curiosity and interest. A college don, Mr. Liddon has no regular charge, and he ordinarily reserves himself for great occasions, for cathedral or other preaching of the highest importance. The writer of this paper has travelled sixty miles to hear Mr. Liddon preach, and probably many persons have had a similar experience. Long before the hour of service commences, the cathedral or church is densely packed. If the admission is by ticket, the tickets have been disposed of days before, and hardly any amount of interest is sufficient to obtain one. On these occasions the clergy number very largely. The white ties and black coats are scattered everywhere about, including many of the most eminent clergy of the day, and at times various of our most eminent prelates.

Many other eminent men are gathered together, eminent in politics, in literature, in science, and art. The people are there in their thousands, with an enormous preponderance of the educated classes. Mr. Liddon's great reputation commenced with the high church party; but since that it has grown familiar to every educated man, and is fast fermenting the great masses of our population. There is an indefinable thrill of emotion amid the vast crowd that assembles to hear words of truth and teaching from a great man, — a contagion of emotion belonging to the hour and the scene. With a quiet rapid tread the preacher makes his way to the pulpit. With a natural, earnest gesture he at once buries his face in his hands to pray. When he fairly faces you, you are at once impressed with his striking and somewhat monastic appearance. Very probably he at once impresses you irresistibly with his likeness to St. Augustine in Ary Scheffer's celebrated picture of Augustine and Monica. The impression deepens upon you if you have ever been a student of Augustine's, as you follow the chain of the discourse and think you grow better acquainted with the orator. For a moment you might fancy that there was a monk before you. The impression is helped by the rapid and almost imperceptible act of adoration with which Mr. Liddon accompanies every mention of the name. There is a basis for this impression in the fact, which we have heard stated on the best authority, that Mr. Liddon has spent years in studying preaching as it is on the Continent, and has formed himself on the best models in France and Italy. When you hear such a preacher as Mr. Lyne, — Brother or Father Ignatius as he is called, — you see merely the external mannerism and the imitated costume of the monk. But Mr. Liddon, disregarding mere externals, reproduces what is best in great Catholic orators, what is deepest founded in the deepest sense of humanity, — the passion, the tragedy, the will, the emotions of mankind. We think that it was something in this way that Fénelon preached in the Cathedral of Cambrai, or that Bossuet thundered in the chapel of Versailles. Mr. Liddon need shrink from no comparison with contemporary foreign eloquence. He is essentially our Lacordaire or Père Felix.

Almost in his first sentence we see the essential character of his oratory. His manuscript is by his side, but he is almost liberated from the chains which a manuscript imposes. He almost knows it by heart, and he declaims it in a grand but a peculiar kind of declamation. It is very remarkable how the greatest pulpit orators of the day are men who read their sermons, which is certainly contrary to the general idea and to ordinary experience. This was the case with such renowned pulpit orators as Dr. Chalmers and Mr. Melvill. The Bishop of Oxford is skilled in both plans, but seems to prefer the manuscript. The Bishop of Peterborough is strictly extemporaneous. Mr. Caird compounds, by learning his sermons off by heart. It is utterly impossible, the human mind being constituted as it is, that any sermon such as Mr. Liddon's could be spoken in extemporaneous sentences. You might as well expect a man to speak in lyrics or in epigrams. Those sermons have evidently been polished and repolished to the last degree of point and finish. This is an advantage which you may have with the written, but cannot have with the extemporized discourse. It is easy to see that Mr. Liddon's sermons have had an amount of thought and elaboration bestowed upon them which, in these days of swift writing and speaking, is, unfortunately, extremely rare. The leading characteristic of his oratory is the uniform high pressure of his impassioned speech. So to speak, there are no eminences or depressions in his oratory. He hardly ever slackens and then puts on speed. There is almost a monotony of eloquence. It is the equable speed and rush of the express train. The eye is kindled, the head thrown back as a war-horse; you detect the nervous, sinewy clutch of the fingers. No sooner have you been startled and attracted by the vivid original manner of the speaker than some modern name or allusion, some clear and trenchant thought seizes your attention, and at once brings you fairly abreast with some religious controversy of the time. As he clenches some argument or summarizes some analysis with a keen remorseless logic, for a moment the face becomes illumined with a smile of thankful triumph. That noted electric link that exists between orator and auditory is touched and thrilled, and the speaker feels that he is carrying with him the convictions as well as the hearts of his hearers. There is a pause — only too slight — before the preacher branches into another section of his subject. The mind is at extreme tension as you attempt to follow the course of the argument through those terse, glittering, incisive sentences, which follow so keenly and swiftly, like the steps of a mathematical demonstrator. Presently that reasoning of the "severe impassioned" order has reached its climax. Hitherto he has been logical, but he is now slightly rhetorical. To use the Greek image, the closed fist is relaxed into the open palm. The orator now turns to the practical part of his subject and its peroration. If up to this point he has sought to convince the reason, he now concentrates his efforts on piercing the heart. There is some touch of exquisite pathos, of heart-stirring appeal, as when, last Easter Day, at St. Paul's, he quoted the lines from the "Lyra Apostolica":—

"And with the morn, those angel-faces smile,
That we have loved long since, and lost erewhile."

And very probably the final peroration is thrown into the form of simple, earnest prayer to the Deity, with an effect of awe and sublimity almost impossible to be described.

As the congregation issue forth from the church or cathedral portals,—and it is long before such masses are broken up,—on every side you hear eager discussion of the sermon. There is no doubt, in the first place, but the preacher has supplied his auditory with an immense intellectual stimulus.

On the oratorical question there is, we think, no doubt; but great as the effect has been it would have heightened if the manuscript had been absent. We have been assured by an eminent dignitary, who had the rare good fortune of hearing Chalmers preach an extemporary sermon, that the effect considerably transcended even the immense effect of his written orations. This might have been the case with Chalmers, whose sermons, after all, are somewhat too expanded and verbose; but such a mode of address could hardly coexist with the literary and dialectic skill of Mr. Liddon. After you have heard Mr. Liddon preach you find considerable difficulty in reconstructing even the skeleton (to use that Simonian word) of his discourse. You remember many a striking phrase, apt illustration, powerful appeal, but your attention has been so overpoweringly absorbed by the magnificent oratory, by the rush of vivid musical language, that you would willingly listen again untiringly to the sermon, or would desire to read it over quietly again and again. When you really come to read it in print, you perceive how closely it is articulated into divisions and subdivisions, which the preacher omitted in the preaching, probably because in the lapse of time the system of divisions has grown somewhat pedantic and old-fashioned. With most popular preachers the sermon dies in its birth, and is lost into thin air. But in the delivery of Mr. Liddon's sermon is only comprised a sectional part of its office. Mr. Liddon is now a considerable theological writer. We have his large volume of the "Bampton Lectures," a volume of University sermons, various scattered sermons, and we have the intimation that another volume of sermons will be shortly forthcoming. Multitudes who do not know him as a preacher know him as an author. In sacred authorship he occupies a very peculiar and distinctive place.

His first volume of sermons was originally entitled "Some Words for God." In deference to friendly criticism Mr. Liddon withdrew that title, and substituted the indistinctive title of "University Sermons." We rather regret this, because the original title gave an idea of the leading characteristic of all Mr. Liddon's written oratory. To him it is emphatically given that he should contend earnestly for the faith, and meet the shifting forms of mental conflict and doubt. He is an Athanasius; if necessary, an Athanasius contra mundum. He has the keenest sympathy with all the stir and movement of the contemporary intellectual life of Europe. He is fully abreast; more than that, he is often in advance of the thought and philosophy of the day. He clearly discovers wherein lies the true stress and brunt of the religious battle of our time, and does not disguise from himself that the real issue is with sheer atheism and profligacy. In a noble sermon preached this summer in St. James's, Piccadilly, he says: "It seems to me that Roman Catholic and Protestant Dissenters must agree with members of the English Church so far as to admit that our deepest differences are insignificant in presence of a dreary materialism which utterly ignores the other world." There is something intensely vivid and lifelike in the mode in which Mr. Liddon meets the seething religious and ethical opinions of the day. He reproduces, exactly at the right moment, the thoughts which are uppermost in the minds of thinking men, and finding expression in the more serious and earnest of current publications. As we follow him from sermon to sermon, it is not difficult to detect the various intellectual tendencies of his sermons, to see at one point how he is combating some of the opinions of Mr. Mill, and at another how he has risen fresh from the perusal of the writings of Mr. Lecky; how, again, he is combating the English forms into which the French system of Comte has thrown itself, and how, again, he is meeting the latest German rationalists before their newest errors have become naturalized in England; once more, how he is crystallizing vague floating thought and difficulties on sacred subjects, or combating the full tide of secular opinion as found in such periodicals as the Pall Mall Gazette or the Saturday Review.

To any one who, in these days of turmoil and unrest, is dissatisfied and unhappy on those ultimate problems which must beset the mind of any thinking man, we would earnestly recommend the writings of Mr. Liddon, whether, as in the "Bampton Lectures," he makes a systematic and scientific exposition of orthodox truth and its counterfeits or opposites, or whether, as in his occasional sermons, he meets the desultory and guerilla attacks which are often best met by a similar system of defence.

There is sometimes greater audacity, sometimes a more familiar vein of reference and allusion, than some persons might think befitting the dignity and tranquil atmosphere of the pulpit. But there are times in which frap pezwite et frappez fort is the general motto. There is undoubtedly a subtle spirit of the age which he ought to be able to apprehend and seize, if he would truly meet its wants and necessities. The great secret of Mr. Liddon's power and influence is that he so thoroughly comprehends and meets the special characteristics, difficulties, peculiarities of the present time. As truly as Socrates has brought down philosophy into common life, does Mr. Liddon, who is often Socratic in his method, bring all details of life into a religious reference. It would be easy to adduce isolated passages of that bold, familiar way in which Mr. Liddon treats many subjects. We may refer to a few such passages, but we deeply feel that the reader ought to repeatedly peruse and make a careful analysis of a sermon of his before he can form an adequate idea of the consummate art and ability with which it is characterized. Here is a home-thrust at the periodical literature which is adverse to religious truth: "Look around and mark the varieties of intellect which enter in various ways into this conflict with religion. There is, first of all, mercenary intellect. This intellect writes or talks at the rate of so much per annum, and one given understanding. 'You take so much, and you write up that minister, you advocate that line of policy, you denounce this institution, attack that theory, you blacken that public man.' 'Done.' Necessity, it may be said, knows no law; and there is an inexpressibly sad proverb about poverty to the effect that it cannot afford to have a conscience. We need not care to examine that saying too narrowly. Some of us, perhaps, have known cases in which really noble souls have bent to a degradation from which they shrank in secret agony, and from which, long ago, they would have torn themselves away if the comfort and even the life of others had not been dependent on their sad, unworthy toil. Gladly, indeed, would I here be silent. But sometimes this hired intellect, in bondage to sharp necessity, or to the mere spirit of gain, passionately asserts its monopoly of freedom. It even tells us, the ministers of Christ, who have freely entered his service, and who rejoice in what it calls our fetters, that we are not free." Here, again, is some outspoken language on the difference between the legal and medical professions, such as is not often heard in the pulpit: "If you are hesitating between law and medicine, it must be admitted that modern English society seems to award a social pre-eminence to law. Yet surely the study of the framework of God's noblest earthly creatures is a higher study than that of any system of human jurisprudence, dashed as every such system must be by human caprice, by human short-sightedness, by human error. Surely, the practice of a profession, almost every activity of which is a fresh corporal work of mercy, must have an increasing attraction for those who, in the moral sense of the expression, seek 'things above.'

"Pardon me, brethren, if I speak too boldly in a matter on which there may fairly be difference of judgment; but I venture to hope, nay, to believe, that as public opinion becomes more Christian, a higher, nay, the very highest social consideration will be everywhere assigned to the members of that noble profession of medicine, which ministers with the one hand to the progress of advancing science, while with the other it daily lavishes its countless deeds of unknown, unacknowledged generosity and kindness on the suffering poor." Here, again, is a most interesting anecdote. "There is a well-authenticated tradition of a famous argument between that great scholar and divine, Bishop Horsley, and one to whom I may be permitted to refer with something of the reverent admiration, due most assuredly from the members of a great society, to a name which it must ever cherish with love and honor,—Dr. Cyril Jackson, Dean of Christ Church. They sat, it is said, late into the night, pouring forth thought for which men would have given one of them at least scanty credit. They were debating the question whether God could be better reached by his creatures through the exercise of their intellect, or through the exercise of their affections. Unwillingly, but step by step, the Bishop, who advocated the claims of intellect, retreated before the arguments of his friend, till at length, in a spirit which did no less honor to his humility than to his candor, he exclaimed, 'Then my whole life has been one great mistake.' Mr. Liddon subjoins in a note, "I am indebted to Dr. Pusey for this account; he received it from Bishop Lloyd."

We had marked a number of passages which we would willingly like to discuss, where the religious interest is united to a popular interest, a literary interest, and the interest that belongs both to mental and natural science. But our limits, and the difficult nature of the ground to be here traversed, warn us to forbear, and merely to entreat our readers to study the writings of the brightest and fullest-orbed mind in the Church of England. That mind rises fully above the dwarfed controversies of the national Church, and takes in with keenest glance all their respective relations to the Catholic Church throughout all the world.

There is hardly any thought or difficulty that has agitated Christian Europe but is here honestly and boldly stated and discussed from the Christian platform, whether connected with the names of Rousseau or Renan, Hegel or Schlegelmacher, Hobbes or Mill. The only preacher who approximates to the intense hold which Mr. Liddon possesses on the hearts and minds of his hearers is the Rev. Stopford Brooke, the biographer of Robertson, and the minister in York Street, St. James's. There is very considerable divergence between Mr. Liddon and Mr. Stopford Brooke in their views, and also in their corresponding intellectual character. There is a practice, a passion, a depth of speculation about Mr. Brooke in which he stands pre-eminent even to Mr. Liddon. Perhaps, however, Mr. Liddon would hardly desire to possess the intense originality which belongs to Mr. Brooke, and it must be confessed that originality is, after all, a dangerous gift for a preacher. Mr. Brooke's place in the church is so unique, and his recent volume of sermons so remarkable, that we have elsewhere sought to do justice to the subject.

We think, therefore, with the utmost confidence, that we may place Mr. Liddon first in the rank of the contemporary orators of the Anglican Church. We cannot but feel a deep feeling of regret, widespread, we are sure, that in this recent cloud of appointments he has not received episcopal preferment. We are not unmindful of the very great pulpit ability that at the present time exists among bishops and dignitaries of the Church. There are many who will refuse, even in favor of Mr. Liddon, to abandon their long and enduring preference of the Bishop of Oxford; and if we regarded mere oratory alone, as we have intimated, the Bishop of Peterborough would bear away the palm.

Dr. Magee is a born orator, while Mr. Liddon has superinduced intense culture upon his fervid style. Archbishop Thomson is noted for his thoughtful handling of philosophical subjects in the pulpit; at the same time most practical, most evangelic; with a grave earnestness rising into a pure, genuine eloquence. The present preacher at Lincoln's Inn, who succeeded Dr. Thomson, is Canon Cooke, who, while lacking the magic touch of eloquence, has the earnestness which is next to and the best part of eloquence, and is in the highest degree weighty and thoughtful. Dr. Moberly, the new Bishop of Salisbury, is one of those who, at the Oxford University pulpit, never failed to draw men largely around him. Of late years there seems to us to have been a distinct falling off in the character of London preaching. So many eminent men cease to hold charge in London. Thus we have lost such men as Thomson, Magee, Alford, Goulburn, Boyd, Dale, by cathedral or church elevation.

It can hardly be said that their successors have made or are likely to make quite the same mark. The most remarkable regular preacher left in London is probably Mr. Stopford Brooke. Far in the west, Mr. Molyneux, and far in the east, Dr. Row-sell, attract and keep together great congregations. Doubtless in the metropolis itself, and also in the provinces, there are men who may hereafter rise to great eminence; but those who have been accustomed for years past to watch the condition of the metropolitan pulpit will probably admit that at the present time there is in London a considerable dearth of pulpit oratory of the highest excellence. It is sometimes said, with what degree of justice or injustice we do not pretend to determine, that the same is the case throughout the country. It must, however, be recollected that in all professions, the Church especially, character rather than ability is the true test of excellence. More than eloquence, learning, fancy, there is need for Christian sincerity and active goodness. But though we willingly concede that these are the highest things, we see no reason for submitting to a low standard of excellence in matters on which depend the fundamental principle whether people will care to come to church and whether they will be attentive when they get there. We do not think that Mr. Liddon's eminent example is one that is susceptible of much general imitation. He would not be able himself to make such a prolonged and exhausting effort week by week, and no regular ordinary congregation would be competent to follow him. But there are certain demands which the laity are entitled to make upon the clergy, and the Church, if it is wise in this, its time of trial, will seek to meet them. The one accomplishment which brings some one to a level with the best and most cultured clergyman, is the power of extemporary speech, an accomplishment which in nearly every case is to be obtained by diligent effort. This generally succeeds in procuring the attention of the audience, and is a practice fraught with reflex good to the orator himself.

But let the clergyman not read mere homilies which would suit equally or ill any age of the Church's history, but let him comprehend and meet the special character and wants of the times in which his own lot is cast. Then let the preacher be sincere and true to himself, going just so far and no farther, as his own thoughts and feelings take him, avoiding all conventional goodness and assumption of mellifluous unction. Let him have the moral courage, if demands on his time and not business have driven him into a corner, to give a seven or ten minutes' sermon, something short and sweet, or tell his people that he is going to read them some other man's sermon. Above all, let them be men of broad thought and reading, cultivate habits of sympathy, toleration, and catholicity, that they may meet the moral and intellectual needs of their followers. The Anglican clergy needs not so much to be great orators, but the present elevation of the standard and tone. They may make themselves, through care, trustworthy guides of the people, and be a means of promoting balance and harmony in the state. It may not be given to them all to be Sons of Thunder, but they may all be "Sons of Consolation."

THE ART OF COAXING.

UNLESS some check shall shortly occur to stay

Emancipation, it seems not unlikely that this age may have to add another to the list of lost arts. There are two kinds of lost arts. First, there are those arts — such as the art of acoustic architecture, and some arts of coloring on clay and canvas — which we should be glad to recover, but cannot, because we have exhausted some material, or because the secret of some process has been forgotten, and cannot at present be rediscovered. These may be called extinct arts. And secondly, there are those lost arts which we might recover if we chose, but which we do not care to revive, because we have no longer any use for them, such as the art of making tapestry, or of embalming the dead. These may perhaps rather be called decayed than extinct arts, because there would be no insuperable difficulty, if occasion should arise, in reviving them. Whether, if once lost, the art of coaxing will have to be classed among the list of extinct, or only of decayed, arts, — whether, that is to say, the Female Emancipation will have so modified human nature that the secret of the process of coaxing will be utterly forgotten, and men and women will be utterly incapable of exercising any allurements upon members of their own or of the opposite sex, — or whether the art will only have fallen into disuse and discredit because found to be unnecessary, and unworthy of the reign of pure wisdom and perfect woman, it is not worth while to discuss. Of the fact that there is some probability of the ultimate disappearance of this famous art, there can be little doubt.

The women who were formerly such assiduous students of the art of coaxing, who felt that in the successful practice of that art lay the real secret of indirect government, and who, holding fast the sound doctrine that indirect government is far more powerful than direct government, contrived by means of an elaborate system of coaxing to get their own way in the world, are passed away; and their successors are playing a very different game. Other women have arisen who know not the value, and who despise the methods, of indirect influence; who are determined to govern directly, and forcibly; who think that power, like knowledge, is nothing unless they display it; and who will doubtless, if they prevail, add one more to the long list of instances of the wisdom of Hesiod's immortal saying, — "Fools, who know not how much more is Half than All!" Already the art of coaxing has been proscribed by the most advanced section of the women of the period. The modern Cornelia and her disciples would as soon think of cringing to man as of coaxing him. They mean to rule him in future with a rod of iron, and not to waste any more time on methods of indirect influence. If this party prevails, so that its principles become fashionable among women at large, it is obvious that the art of coaxing will cease to be exercised by woman upon man; and, as it is inconceivable that the emancipated and enlightened woman should be amenable to any other influences than that of pure reason, there will of course be no opportunity for the practice of the art by the women of the future upon one another, or by the men upon them. Our modern Cornelia is a hopelessly uncoaxable creature. To practise the art of coaxing upon the Rev. Mrs. Olympia Brown would be like stroking the dome of St. Paul's to please the Dean and Chapter. The only chance, therefore, for the preservation of the art is the possibility that men may continue to exercise it, in a this is a poor prospect. The inferior sex will probably, in this as in other matters, imitate their betters; and the art will perish.

Perhaps a little consideration may show that the discredit into which this ancient art has fallen with woman militant is not altogether reasonable. Possibly the loss of the art, if it should become extinct, may one day be regretted even by woman triumphant. Several fallacies seem just now to be current in the school of Cornelia respecting the art of coaxing. One of these fallacious notions is that the art is a pitiful trick whereby the weak strive to get some share of influence in the affairs of life; and that it is not, and need not be, practised by the strong. If this were so, — if this venerable art were valuable only to the weak, — there would not be much to recommend it to the women of the future. But it is not true, any more than is its kindred fallacy of supposing that the art of coaxing is one which has hitherto been peculiar to women; that it has not been much practised by men, but is a specialty of womanhood. As on these two fallacies is built much of the contempt which Cornelia and her disciples display for the art, it may be worth while to consider them a little. To be weak and to be womanly, — these are the two bugbears against which the modern Amazon most hotly crusades. She despises the weakness of her sisters as much as she loathes her own womanhood. If it can be shown that the art of coaxing is not weak, much will have been done to conciliate her towards it. But if it can be shown that the art is not exclusively womanly, that will be a real hit; for her strongest objection to it will be removed.

Coaxing is the best mode of indirect government. "Many men, many minds," says the proverb; and it is not easy to see how the numbers or the differences of minds will be diminished by the association of woman with man in the business of government, or even by her ultimate supremacy. Perhaps a few centuries of petticoat supremacy may destroy the antagonism of wills, by causing us all to know what is best, and not only so, but also practise what we know. But it will take a long time to realize this woman's millennium, and until that consummation arrives there must be an antagonism of wills; and the woman of the future will find, as the men and women of the past have found, that there are only three ways of making antagonistic wills do her bidding, — namely, force, fraud, and coaxing.

Of these three there can be no doubt that coaxing is the more masterly process. It is more economical of power than force, and more sure of success than fraud, while it is far less demoralizing than either. Compulsion is a brutal process, which creates as much fresh opposition as that which it was designed to overcome, and which wastes so much power in mere friction that the result is always disproportionate to the effort. Fraud, is not, of course, brutal. It may be as ingenious and delicate a mechanism as coaxing. But there is the perpetual danger of detection; and detection implies ruin, or a recurrence to force. Force and fraud, too, are equally obnoxious to reaction, that special disease of extremes. The red spectre dogs the tyrant, just as the sceptical spirit haunts the miracle-monger. From these defects the art of coaxing is free. It wastes no power; on the contrary, it economizes even hostile forces by converting them into voluntary assistants. If detected, its success is not necessarily ruined. Some capital coaxing is sometimes done with perfect openness on the part of the operator, and perfect consciousness on the part of the patient, who, though he knows that he is being made to submit his will to that of the coaxer, yet finds the process so agreeable that he acquiesces in it.

The art of coaxing does not depend for its success upon physical weakness only, like the rule of force, or upon the mere fallibility of opinion, like the rule of fraud. It strikes an alliance with the will, and, having secured its adherence, controls all the other powers and forces through that agency, without the least friction, the least uncertainty of result, or the least danger of reaction. It is a really scientific art, based on psychological verities, and as such ought to command the respect of Cornelia and other wise women. At any rate it is obvious that the use of the art is no sign of weakness, and that it cannot hitherto have been merely a woman's art. Had women held, as Cornelia pretends, a monopoly of this art, they would long ago have enslaved men, and completely tyrannized the world.

The most rudimentary kind of coaxing is mere blandishment. It works upon the senses, passions, or appetites. It is represented in the stories of Delilah, Judith, and Omphale, and in Milton's Eve. Such coaxing has not attained the rank of an art. It may be seen any day at the Zoological Gardens, and requires no comment. Sensuous coaxing, more or less refined according to the skill of the practitioner or the taste of the age, but still profoundly sensuous, appealing more to the appetites and passions than even to the feelings, has generally been the kind in which women have been most successful. The most celebrated and most refined woman-coaxers of history, such as Cleopatra and Mary Stuart, though they were perhaps not very beautiful in face, and though they owed much of their success to superior culture and talent, yet depended ultimately rather upon physical than upon mental effects for the completeness of their triumphs. They never, it will be observed, attempted, or else they failed, to influence really superior men. Plutarch's exquisite description of the coaxing of Antony by Cleopatra only makes us feel how impossible it was that she should succeed with Cæsar. As we advance in civilization, the art of coaxing acquires more intellectual elements, and refines away the grossness of its sensuous parts. It still appeals to the senses and feelings, and not to reason, otherwise it would be conviction, and not coaxing; but it puts this appeal in a delicate and subtle form, so that all grossness disappears. Such is the coaxing of the Homeric heroes.

All the best of them are proficient in the art, though of course Ulysses as the ablest, and Agamemnon as the most interested, one of the company surpass the others. The Homeric art of coaxing is far superior to that of Cleopatra, but it is still very rudimentary. It uses "soft and gainful speech," whereby it appeals to the feelings, — sometimes to the baser feelings of pride, vanity, and self-love; and sometimes to the nobler feelings of filial love, love of home, of friends, and of all that is just and good. It generally acts by physical as well as mental contact, trying to clasp the knees, and kiss the hands and feet, as well as to raise the emotions. There is much of mere blandishment in it. It is not unrefined, but it is quite as much sensuous as intellectual.

Perhaps the most perfect picture that antiquity affords us of the intellectual side of the art of coaxing is Plato's representation of the use of it by Socrates. There we see the most perfect language that ever was coined for the purpose of coaxing used by the most perfect master of the study of human nature. Admirable as is, in its way, the coaxing speech of Ulysses to the Phæacian princess in the sixth Odyssey, the coaxing speeches of Socrates are still more admirable. They have a more difficult subject to handle, but they handle it with quite as much ability and success. They are more highly intellectual, and rest upon more delicate and subtle influences. And then there is the delicious vein of irony running all through them, and giving them a perpetual piquancy and freshness. The language and manner of Socrates were probably the most perfect instruments that have ever been known for coaxing highly cultivated men.

Nor has the art of coaxing been of less importance to public men in modern times. Indeed, it may almost be said that, in a civilized country like England, great men have generally been successful in public affairs in proportion as they possessed a mastery of this art, and have failed whenever they neglected or fell short in it. Lord Palmerston was a thorough master of the art of coaxing the House of Commons, and thereby the country.

It was not his custom to engage in the fruitless task of trying to argue down a motley representative assembly. He was almost as chary of arguments as of threats. As far as possible he avoided friction, and tried to influence the wills of his followers. Whatever was good in his policy was effected with the least waste of power, and whatever was bad was not made worse by fuss. In this respect, as in others, he afforded an interesting contrast with his colleague, Mr. Lowe; who, though not inferior to him in intellect or energy, has never tried, or has failed, to acquire the art of coaxing. When he had charge of an infinitesimally small measure of educational reform, he managed, by an imperious manner, by bitter words, by an unfortunate semblance of juggling, and by pressing arguments which proved too much, to create an opposition which very nearly overbalanced the influence of his party, and even the enthusiastic support of the Times; and which, though it only crippled and did not defeat his measure, ultimately drove him from office. Mr. Gladstone, on the other hand, has a partial but very unequal mastery of the art. He is totally unable to coax the House of Commons, and, whenever he has tried it, has ludicrously failed. But he is very successful in coaxing that part of the community which is vaguely styled "the working-classes." His celebrated "flesh and blood" oration has never yet received its due tribute from politicians, as a masterpiece in the art of coaxing the canaille. Those who regarded it only as an argument addressed to the House were amazed at its puerility; but those who saw that it was really a sop flung to the mob outside knew better. It has probably done more to make Mr. Gladstone the idol of the working-classes than years of consistent labor in their service would have accomplished.

ST. PAUL AND PROTESTANTISM.

BY MATTHEW ARNOLD.

II.

WE have seen how Puritanism seems to come by its religion in the first instance theologically and from authority; Paul by his, on the other hand, psychologically and from experience. Even the have not reached in the same order or by the same road. The miserable sense of sin from unrighteousness, the joyful witness of a good conscience from righteousness, these are points in which Puritanism and St. Paul meet. They are facts of human nature and can be verified by science. But whereas Puritanism, so far as science is concerned, ends with these facts, and rests the whole weight of its antecedent theurgy upon the testimony they offer, Paul begins with these facts, and has not yet, so far as we have followed him, called upon them to prove anything but themselves. The scientific difference, as we have already remarked, which this establishes between Paul and Puritanism is immense, and is all in Paul's favor. Sin and righteousness, together with their eternal accompaniments of fear and hope, misery and happiness, can prove themselves; but they can by no means prove, also, Puritanism's history of original sin, election, and justification. We have now to see whether Paul, in passing from the undoubted facts of experience with which he begins, to his religion properly so called, abandons in any essential points of his teaching the advantage with which he started, and ends, as Puritanism commences, with a batch of arbitrary and unscientific assumptions.

We left Paul in collision with a fact of human nature, but in itself a sterile fact, — a fact on which it is possible to dwell too long, though Puritanism has remained absorbed in the contemplation of it, and indeed has never properly got beyond it, — the sense of sin. This sense, however, it is also possible not to have strongly enough, and the Greeks, with all their great gifts, had not this sense strongly enough; its strength in the Hebrew people is one of this people's mainsprings. "Mine iniquities have taken hold upon me so that I am not able to look up; they are more than the hairs of mine head; therefore my heart faileth me." They are more than the hairs of mine head; the motions of what Paul calls the law in our members are indeed a hydra-brood; when we are working against one fault, a dozen others crop up without our expecting it; and this it is which drives the man who deals seriously with himself to difficulty, nay, to despair. Paul did not need James to tell him that whoever offends on one point is, so far at least as his own conscience and inward satisfaction is concerned, guilty of all; he knew it himself, and the unrest this knowledge gave him was his very starting-point.

He knew, too, that nothing outward, no satisfaction of all the requirements men may make of us, no privileges of any sort can give peace of conscience, — of conscience, "whose praise is not of men but of God." He knew, also, that the law of the moral order stretches beyond us and our private conscience, is independent of our sense of having kept it, and stands absolute and what in itself it is; even therefore, though I may know nothing against myself, yet this is not enough, I may still not be just. Finally, he knew that merely to know all this and say it, is of no use, advances us nothing; "the kingdom of God is not in word but in power."

We have several times said that the Hebrew race apprehended God, — the universal order by which all things fulfil the law of their being, — chiefly as the moral order in human nature, and that it was their greatness that they apprehended him as this so distinctly and powerfully. But it is also characteristic of them, and perhaps it is what mainly dis-

Christianity, that they constantly thought, too, of God as the source of life and breath and all things, and of what they called "fulness of life," in all things. This way of thinking was common to them with the Greeks, but whereas the Greeks threw more delicacy and imagination into it, the Hebrews threw more energy and vital warmth. "God's righteousness," indeed, "standeth like the strong mountains, his judgments are like the great deep; he is a righteous judge, strong and patient, who is provoked every day."

This is the Hebrew's first and deepest conception of God, — as the source of the moral order. But God is also, to the Hebrews, "the rock from which we are hewn," the power by which we have been "upholden ever since we were born," that has "fashioned us and laid his hand upon us," and envelops us on every side, that has "made us fearfully and wonderfully," and whose "mercy is over all his works." He is the power that "saves both man and beast, gives them drink of his pleasures as out of the river," and with whom is "the well of life." In his speech at Athens, Paul shows how full he, too, was of this feeling; and in the famous passage in the first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, where he asserts the existence of the natural moral law, the source he assigns to this law is not merely God in conscience, the righteous judge, but God in the world and the workings of the world, the eternal and divine power from which all life and energy proceed. This element in which we live and move and have our being, which stretches around and beyond the strictly moral element in us, around and beyond the finite sphere of what is originated, measured, and controlled by our own understanding and will, — this infinite element is very present to Paul's thoughts, and makes a profound impression on them. "No man," as the Hebrew psalm says, "hath quickened his own soul." Through every great spirit runs a train of feeling of this sort; and the power and depth which there undoubtedly is in Calvinism, comes from Calvinism's being possessed by it. Paul is not, like Calvinism, possessed by it; but it is always before his mind and strongly agitates his thoughts.

The voluntary, rational, and human world of righteousness, moral choice, effort, filled the first place in his spirit. But the necessary, mystical, and divine world of influence, sympathy, emotion, filled the second, and he could pass naturally from the one to the other. What he calls "the power that worketh in us," and that produces results transcending all our expectations and calculations, he instinctively sought to combine with our personal agencies of reason and conscience.

Of such a power and its operation some clear notion may be got by everybody who has ever had any overpowering attachment, or has been, according to the common expression, in love. Every one knows how being in love changes for the time a man's spiritual atmosphere, and makes animation and buoyancy where before there was flatness and dulness. One may even say that this is the reason why being in love is so popular with the whole human race, — because it relieves in so irresistible and delightful a manner the tedium or depression of commonplace human life. And not only does it change the atmosphere of our spirits, making air, light, and movement where before was stagnation and gloom, but it also sensibly and powerfully increases our faculties of action. It is matter of the commonest remark how a timid man who is in love will show courage, or an indolent man will show diligence. Nay, a timid man who would be only the more paralyzed in a moment of danger by being told that it is his bounden duty as a man to show firmness, and that he must be ruined and disgraced forever if he does not, will show firmness quite easily from being in love.

An indolent man who shrinks back from vigorous effort only the more because he is told and knows that it is a man's business to show energy, and that it is shameful in him if he does not, will show energy quite easily from being in love. This, I say, we learn from the analogy of the most everyday experience, — that a powerful attachment will give a man spirits and confidence which he could by no mean call up or command of himself; and that in this mood he can do wonders which would not be possible to him without it.

We have seen how Paul felt himself to be for the sake of righteousness apprehended, to use his own expression, by Christ. "I seek," he says, "to apprehend that for which * also I am apprehended by Christ." This for which he is thus apprehended is — still to use his own words — the righteousness of God; not an incomplete and maimed righteousness, not a partial and unsatisfying establishment of the law of the spirit, dominant to-day, deposed to-morrow, effective at one or two points, failing in a hundred; but an entire conformity at all points with the divine moral order, the will of God, and, in consequence, a sense of harmony with this order, of acceptance with God. In some points Paul had always served this order with a clear conscience. He did not steal, he did not commit adultery.

But he was at the same time, he says himself, "a blasphemer and a persecutor and an insulter," and Christ enabled him to feel this. Here was his greatness, and the worth of his way of appropriating Christ. We have seen how Calvinism, too, — Calvinism which has built itself upon Paul, — is a blasphemer, when it speaks of good works done by those who do not hold the Calvinist doctrine. There would need no great sensitiveness of conscience, one would think, to show that Calvinism has often been, also, a persecutor and an insulter. But the difference between Paul's hold on Christ and Calvinism's is this: that Paul by studying Christ got to know himself and to transform his narrow conception of righteousness, while Calvinism studies both Christ and Paul after him to no such good purpose.

These, however, are but the veriest rudiments of the history of Paul's gain from Christ, as the particular impression mentioned is but the veriest fragment of the total impression produced on him. The sum and substance of that total impression may best be conveyed by two words, — without sin. We must here revert to what we have already said of the importance, for sound criticism of a man's ideas, of the order in which his ideas come. For us, who approach Christianity through a scholastic theology, it is Christ's divinity which establishes his being without sin. For Paul, who approached Christianity through his personal experience, it was Christ's being without sin which established his divinity.

The large and complete conception of righteousness to which he himself had slowly and late, and only by Christ's help, awakened, in Christ he saw existing absolutely and naturally. The devotion to this conception which made it meat and drink to carry it into effect, — a devotion of which he himself was strongly and deeply conscious, — he saw in Christ still stronger, by far, and deeper than in himself. But for attaining the righteousness of God, for reaching an absolute conformity with the moral order and with God's will, he saw no such impotence existing in Christ's case as in his own. For Christ, the uncertain conflict between the law in our members and the law of the spirit did not appear to exist. Those eternal vicissitudes of victory and defeat, which drove Paul to despair, in Christ were absent; smoothly and inevitably he followed the real and eternal order in preference to the momentary and apparent order. Obstacles outside him there were plenty, but obstacles within him there were none. He was led by the Spirit of God; he was dead to sin, he lived to God; and in this life to God he persevered even to the cruel bodily death of the cross. As many as are led by the Spirit of God, says Paul, are the sons of God. If this is so with even us, who live to God so feebly and who render such an imperfect obedience, how much more is he who lives to God entirely and who renders an unalterable obedience, the unique and only Son of God? This is undoubtedly the main line of movement which Paul's ideas respecting Christ follow. He had been trained, however, in the scholastic theology of Judaism, just as we are trained in the scholastic theology of Christianity; would that we were as little embarrassed with our training as he was!

The Jewish theological doctrine respecting the eternal word or wisdom of God, which was with God from the beginning before the oldest of his works, and through which the world was created, — this doctrine, which appears in the Book of Proverbs and again in the Book of Wisdom, Paul applied to Christ, and in the Epistle to the Colossians there is a remarkable passage with clear signs of his thus applying it. But then this metaphysical and theological basis to the historic being of Christ is something added by Paul from outside to his own essential ideas concerning Christ, something which fitted them and was naturally taken on to them; it is not an original part of his system, much less the ground of it. It fills a very different place in his system from the place which it fills in the system of John, who takes his starting-point from it. Paul's starting-point, it cannot be too often repeated, is the idea of righteousness; and his concern with Christ is as the clew to righteousness, not as the clew to transcendental ontology. Speculations in this region had no real attraction for Paul, notwithstanding the traces of an acquaintance with them which we find in his writings, and notwithstanding the great activity of his intellect; but this activity threw itself with an unerring instinct into a sphere where, with whatever travail and through whatever impediments to clear expression, directly practical religious results might yet be won, and not into any sphere of abstract speculation.

Much more visible and important than his identification of Christ with the divine hypostasis known as the Logos, is Paul's identification of him with the Messiah. Ever present is his recognition of him as the Messiah to whom all the law and prophets pointed, of whom the heart of the Jewish race was full, and on whom the Jewish instructors of Paul's youth had dwelt abundantly. The Jewish language and ideas respecting the end of the world and the Messiah's kingdom, his day, his presence, his appearing, his glory, Paul applied to Christ, and constantly used. Of the force and reality which these ideas and expressions had for him, there can be no question; as to his use of them, only two remarks are needed. One is, that in him these Jewish ideas — as any one will feel who calls to mind a genuine display of them like that in the Apocalypse — are spiritualized; and as he advances in his course they are spiritualized increasingly. The other remark is that important as these ideas are in Paul, of them, too, the importance is only secondary, compared with that of the great central matter of his thoughts: the righteousness of God, the non-fulfilment of it by man, the fulfilment of it by Christ.

Once more we are led to a result favorable to the scientific value of Paul's teaching. That Christ was the divine Logos, the second person of the Trinity, science can neither deny nor affirm; that he was the Jewish Messiah, who will some day appear in the sky with the sound of trumpets, to put an end to the actual kingdoms of the world and to establish his own kingdom, science can neither deny nor affirm. The very terms of which these propositions are composed are such as science is unable to handle. But that the Christ of the Bible follows the universal order and the will of God, without being let and hindered as we are by the motions of private passion and by self-will, this is evident to whoever can read the Bible with open eyes.

It is just what any criticism of the Gospel-history, which sees that history as it really is, tells us; it is the scientific result of that history. And this is the result which pre-eminently occupies Paul. Of Christ's life and death, the all-importance for us, according to Paul, is that by means of them, "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly"; should be enabled to "bear fruit to God" in "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, kindness, goodness, faith, mildness, self-control." Their scope was "to redeem us from all iniquity, and make us purely zealous for good works." Paul adds, that we are to live thus in the actual world which now is, "with the expectation of the appearing of the glory of God and Christ." By nature and habit, Paul used these words to mean a Messianic coming and kingdom. Later Christianity has transferred them, as it has transferred so much else of Paul's, to a life beyond the grave; but it has by no means spiritualized them. Paul, as his spiritual growth advanced, spiritualized them more and more; he came to think, in using them, more and more of a gradual inward transformation of the world by a conformity like Christ's to the will of God, than of a Messianic advent. Yet even then they are always second with him, and not first; the essence of saving grace is always to make us righteous, to bring us into conformity with the divine law, to enable us to "bear fruit to God."

"Christ gave himself for us that he might ransom us from iniquity." First of all, he rendered an unbroken obedience to the law of the spirit; he served the Spirit of God; he came, not to do his own will, but the will of God. The law of the spirit makes men one; it is only by the law in our members that we are many. Secondly, therefore, he had an unflinching sense of what we have called, using an expressive modern term, the solidarity of men; that it was not God's will that one of his human creatures should perish. Thirdly, he persevered in this uninterrupted obedience to the law of the spirit, in this unflinching sense of human solidarity, even to the death; though everything befell him which might break the one or tire out the other. Lastly, he had in himself, in all he said and did, that ineffable force of attraction which doubled the virtue of everything said or done by him. If ever there was a case in which the wonder-working power of attachment might employ itself and work its wonders, it was here. Paul felt the power penetrate him; and he felt, also, how by perfectly identifying himself through it with Christ, and in no other way, could he ever get the confidence and the force to do as Christ did. He thus found a point in which the mighty world outside man, and the weak world inside him, seemed to combine for his salvation. The struggling stream of duty, which had not volume enough to bear him to his goal, was suddenly reinforced by the immense wave of sympathy and emotion. To this new and potent influence Paul gave the name of faith. The word points, no doubt, to "coming by hearing," and has a reminiscence, for Paul, of his not having with his own eyes, like the original disciples, seen Christ, and of his special mission being to Gentiles who had not seen Christ either.

But the essential meaning of the word is "power of holding on to the unseen," "fidelity." Other attachments demand fidelity in absence to an object which at some time or other, nevertheless, has been seen; this attachment demands fidelity to an object which both is absent and has never been seen by us. It is therefore rightly called not constancy, but faith; a power, pre-eminently, of fast attachment to the unseen. Identifying ourselves with Christ through this attachment, we become as he was; we live with his thoughts and feelings, and we participate, therefore, in his freedom from the ruinous law in our members, in his obedience to the saving law of the spirit, in his conformity to the eternal order, in the joy and peace of his life to God. "The law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus," says Paul, "freed me from the law of sin and death." This is what is done for us by faith.

In this word faith we reach a word round which the ceaseless stream of religious exhortation and discussion has for ages circled. Even for those who misconceive Paul's line of ideas most completely, faith is so evidently the central point in his system that their thoughts cannot but centre upon it. Puritanism, as is well known, has talked of little else but faith. And the word is of such a nature, that the true clew once lost which Paul has given us to its meaning, every man may put into it almost anything he likes, all the fancies of his superstition or of his fanaticism.

To say, therefore, that to have faith in Christ means to be attached to Christ, to embrace Christ, is not enough; the question is, to be attached to him how, to embrace him how? A favorite expression of popular theology conveys perfectly the popular definition of faith: to rest in the finished work of the Saviour. In the scientific language of Calvinism, to embrace Christ, to have saving faith, is "to give our consent heartily to the covenant of grace, and so to receive the benefit of justification, whereby God pardons all our sins and accepts us as righteous for the righteousness of Christ imputed to us." This is mere theurgy, of which, so far as we have yet gone, we have not found a trace in Paul. Wesley, with his genius for godliness, struggled all his life for some deeper and more edifying account of that faith, which he felt working wonders in his own soul, than that it was a hearty consent to the covenant of grace and an acceptance of the benefit of Christ's imputed righteousness. Yet this amiable and gracious spirit, but intellectually slight and shallow compared to Paul, beat his wings in vain. Paul, nevertheless, had solved the problem for him, if only he could have had eyes to see Paul's solution. "He that believes in Christ," says Wesley, "discerns spiritual things; he is enabled to taste, see, hear, and feel God." There is nothing practical and solid here. A company of Cornish revivalists will have no difficulty in tasting, seeing, hearing, and feeling God, twenty times over, to-night, and yet may be none the better for it to-morrow morning. When Paul said, Have faith in Christ, these words did not mean, for him, "Give your hearty belief and consent to the covenant of grace, accept the offered benefit of justification through Christ's imputed righteousness." They did not mean, "Try and discern spiritual things, try and taste, see, hear, and feel God." They did not mean, "Rest in the finished work of Christ the Saviour." No, they meant: Die with him!

The object of this essay is not religious edification, but the true criticism of a great and misunderstood author. Yet it is impossible to be in presence of this Pauline conception of faith without remarking on the incomparable power of edification which it contains. It is indeed a crowning evidence of that piercing practical religious sense which we have attributed to Paul. It is at once mystical and rational; and it enlists in its service the best forces of both worlds, — the world of reason and morals, and the world of sympathy and emotion. The world of reason and duty has an excellent clew to action, but wants motive-power; the world of sympathy and influence has an irresistible force of motive-power, but wants a clew for directing its exertion. The danger of the one world is weariness in well-doing; the danger of the other is sterile raptures and immoral fanaticism. Paul takes from both worlds what can help him, and leaves what cannot. The elemental power of sympathy and emotion in us, a power which extends beyond the limits of our own will and conscious activity, which we cannot measure and control, and which in each of us differs immensely in force, volume, and mode of manifestation, he calls into full play, and sets it to work with all its strength and in all its variety. But one unalterable object is assigned by him to this power: to die with Christ to the law of the flesh, to live with Christ to the law of the mind.

Paul's repeated and minute lists of practices and feelings to be followed or suppressed now take a heightened significance. They were the matter by which his faith tried itself and knew itself. Those multitudinous motions of appetite and self-will which reason and conscience disapproved, reason and conscience could yet not govern, and had to yield to them. This, as we have seen, is what drove Paul almost to despair. Well, then, how did Paul's faith help him here? It enabled him to reinforce duty by affection. In the central need of his nature, the desire to govern these motions of unrighteousness, it enabled him to say: Die to them! Christ did. If any man be in Christ, said Paul, — that is, if any man identifies himself with Christ by attachment so that he enters into his feelings and lives with his life, — he is a new creature; he can do, and does, what Christ did. First, he suffers with him. Christ, throughout his life and in his death, presented his body a living sacrifice to God; every self-willed impulse blindly trying to assert itself without respect of the universal order, he died to. You, says Paul to his disciple, are to do the same. Never mind how various and multitudinous the impulses are,—impulses to intemperance, concupiscence, covetousness, pride, sloth, envy, malignity, anger, clamor, bitterness, harshness, unmercifulness. Die to them all, and to each as it comes! Christ did. If you cannot, your attachment, your faith, must be one that goes but a very little way.

In an ordinary human attachment, out of love to a woman, out of love to a friend, out of love to a child, you can suppress quite easily, because by sympathy you become one with them and their feelings, this or that impulse of selfishness which happens to conflict with them, and which hitherto you have obeyed. All impulses of selfishness conflict with Christ's feelings, he showed it by dying to them all; if you are one with him by faith and sympathy, you can die to them also. Then, secondly, if you thus die with him, you become transformed by the renewing of your mind, and rise with him. The law of the spirit of life which is in Christ becomes the law of your life also, and frees you from the law of sin and death. You rise with him to that harmonious conformity with the real and eternal order, that sense of pleasing God who trieth the hearts, which is life and peace, and which grows more and more till it becomes glory. If you suffer with him therefore, you shall also be glorified with him.

The real worth of this mystical conception depends on the fitness of the character and history of Christ for inspiring such an enthusiasm of attachment and devotion as that which Paul's notion of faith implies. If the character and history are eminently such as to inspire it, then Paul has no doubt found a mighty aid towards the attainment of that righteousness of which Christ's life afforded the admirable pattern. A great solicitude is always shown by popular Christianity to establish a radical difference between Christ and a teacher like Socrates. Ordinary theologians establish this difference by transcendental distinctions into which science cannot follow them.

But what makes for science the radical difference between Jesus and Socrates is, that such a conception as Paul's would, if applied to Socrates, be out of place and ineffective. Socrates inspired boundless friendship and esteem; but the inspiration of reason and conscience is the one inspiration which comes from him, and which impels us to live righteously as he did. A penetrating enthusiasm of love, sympathy, pity, adoration, reinforcing the inspiration of reason and duty, does not belong to Socrates. With Jesus it is different. On this point it is needless to argue; history has proved. In the midst of errors the most prosaic, the most immoral, the most unscriptural, concerning God, Christ, and righteousness, the immense emotion of love and sympathy inspired by the person and character of Jesus, has had to work almost by itself alone for righteousness; and it has worked wonders. The surpassing religious grandeur of Paul's conception of faith is that it seizes a real salutary emotional force of incalculable magnitude, and reinforces moral effort with it.

Paul's mystical conception is not complete without its relation of us to our fellow-men, as well as its relation of us to Christ. Whoever identifies himself with Christ, identifies himself with Christ's idea of the solidarity of men. The whole race is conceived as one body, having to die and rise with Christ, and forming, by the joint action of its regenerate members, the mystical body of Christ. Hence the truth of that which Bishop Wilson says: "It is not so much our neighbor's interest as our own that we love him."

Christ's life, with which we by faith identify ourselves, is not complete, his aspiration after the eternal order is not satisfied, so long as only Christ himself follows this order, or only this or that individual amongst us men follows it. The same law of emotion and sympathy, therefore, which prevails in our inward self-discipline, is to prevail in our dealings with others. The motions of sin in ourselves we succeed in mortifying, not by saying to ourselves that they are sinful, but by sympathy with Christ in his mortification of them. In like manner, our duties towards our neighbor we perform, not in deference to external commands and prohibitions, but through identifying ourselves with him, by sympathy with Christ who identified himself with him. Therefore, we owe no man anything but to love one another; and he who loves his neighbor fulfils the law towards him, because he seeks to do him good and forbears to do him harm just as if he was himself. Mr. Lecky cannot see that the command to speak the truth to one's neighbor is a command which has a natural sanction; But according to these Pauline ideas it has a clear natural sanction; for if my neighbor is merely an extension of myself, deceiving my neighbor is the same as deceiving myself; and than self-deceit there is nothing by nature more baneful. And on this ground Paul puts the injunction; he says, "Speak every man truth to his neighbor, for we are members one of another."

This direction to identify ourselves in Christ with our neighbors is hard and startling, no doubt, like the direction to identify ourselves with Christ and die with him. But it is also, like that direction, inspiring; and not, like a set of mere mechanical commands and prohibitions, lifeless and unaiding. It shows a profound practical religious sense, and rests upon facts of human nature which experience can follow and appreciate.

The three essential terms of Pauline theology are not, therefore, as popular theology makes them: calling, justification, sanctification; they are rather these: dying with Christ, resurrection from the dead, growing into Christ.* The order in which these terms are placed indicates what we have already pointed out elsewhere, the true Pauline sense of the expression, resurrection from the dead. In Paul's ideas the expression has no essential connection with physical death. It is true, popular theology connects it with this almost exclusively, and regards any other use of it as purely figurative and secondary. For popular theology, Christ's resurrection is his bodily resurrection on earth after his physical death on the cross; the believer's resurrection is his bodily resurrection in a future world, the golden city of our hymns and of the Apocalypse. For this theology, the force of Christ's resurrection is that it is a miracle which guarantees the promised future miracle of our own resurrection.

It is a common remark with Biblical critics, even with able and candid Biblical critics, that Christ's resurrection, in this sense of a physical miracle, is the central object of Paul's thoughts and the foundation of all his theology. Nay, the preoccupation * ἀποβαίνειν σὺν Χριστῷ, Col. II. 20; ἐκ νεκρῶν ἐκ νεκρῶν, Phil. III. 11; αἰθέρις εἰς Χριστόν, Eph. IV. 15.

with this idea has altered the very text of our documents; so that whereas Paul wrote, "Christ died and lived," we read, "Christ died and rose again and revived." But whoever has carefully followed Paul's line of thought as we have endeavored to trace it will see that in his mature theology, as the Epistle to the Romans exhibits it, it cannot be this physical and miraculous aspect of the resurrection which holds the first place in his mind; for under this aspect the resurrection does not fit in with the ideas which he is developing.

Not for a moment do we deny that in Paul's earlier theology, and notably in the Epistles to the Thessalonians and Corinthians, the physical and miraculous aspect of the resurrection, both Christ's and the believer's is primary and predominant. Not for a moment do we deny that to the end of his life, after the Epistle to the Romans, after the Epistle to the Philippians, if he had been asked whether he held the doctrine of the resurrection in its physical and miraculous sense, as well as in his own spiritual and mystical sense, he would have replied with entire conviction that he did. Very likely it would have been impossible to him to imagine his theology without it. But,

"Below the surface-stream, shallow and light,
Of what we say we feel — below the stream,
As light, of what we think we feel — there flows
With noiseless current strong, obscure, and deep,
The central stream of what we feel indeed"; and by this alone are we truly characterized. Paul's originality lies in the effort to make the significance of all the processes, however mystical, of the religious life, palpable even to the intellect, with a view of strengthening, in this way, their hold upon us and their command of all our nature. Sooner or later he was sure to be drawn to treat the process of resurrection with this endeavor. He did so treat it; and what is original and essential in him is his doing so.

Paul's conception of life and death inevitably came to govern his conception of resurrection. What, indeed, as we have seen, is for Paul life, and what is death? Not the ordinary physical life and death; — death, for him, is living after the flesh, obedience to sin; life is mortifying by the spirit the deeds of the flesh, obedience to righteousness. Resurrection, in its essential sense, is therefore for Paul, the rising, within the sphere of our visible earthly existence, from death in this sense to life in this sense. It is indubitable that, so far as the human believer's resurrection is concerned, this is so; else how could Paul say to the Colossians (to take only one out of a hundred clear texts showing the same thing), "If ye then have risen with Christ, seek the things that are above." But when Paul repeats again and again, in the Epistle to the Romans, that the matter of our faith is "that God raised Jesus from the dead," the essential meaning of this resurrection, also, is just the same.

Real life for Paul, begins with the mystical death which frees us from the dominion of the external shalls and shall nots of the law.* From the moment, therefore, Christ was content to do God's will he died. Paul's point is, that Christ in his earthly existence obeyed the law of the spirit and bore fruit to God, and that the believer should, in his earthly existence, do the same. That Christ "died to sin," that he "pleased not himself," and that, consequently, through all his life here, he was risen and living to God, is what occupies Paul. Christ's physical resurrection after he was crucified is neither in point of time nor in point of character the resurrection on which Paul, following his essential line of thought, wanted to fix the believer's mind. The resurrection Paul was striving after for himself and others was a resurrection now and a resurrection to righteousness. But Christ's obeying God and not pleasing himself culminated in his death on the cross; and the self-sacrificing obedience of his whole life, which was summed up in this great, final act, is, therefore, constantly regarded by Paul under the figure of this final act, as is also the believer's conformity to Christ's obedience. The believer is crucified with Christ when he mortifies by the spirit the deeds of unrighteousness; Christ was crucified when he pleased not himself, and came to do not his own will but God's.

It is the same with life as with death; it turns on no physical event, but on that central concern of Paul's thoughts, — righteousness. If we have the spirit of Christ we live, as he did, by the spirit, "serve the Spirit of God,"* and follow the eternal order; the Spirit of God, the Spirit of Christ is the same, — the one eternal moral order. If we are led by the Spirit of God we are the sons of God, — and share with Christ the heritage of the sons of God, — eternal life, peace, felicity, glory. The spirit, therefore, is life because of righteousness. And when, through identifying ourselves with Christ, we reach Christ's righteousness, then eternal life begins for us, — a continuous and ascending life, for the eternal order never dies, and the more we transform ourselves into servants of righteousness and organs of the eternal order, the more we are and desire to be this eternal order and nothing else. Even in this life we are "seated in heavenly places," as Christ is, so entirely, for Paul, is righteousness the true life and the true heaven. But the transformation cannot be completed here; the physical death is regarded by Paul as a stage at which it ceases to be impeded. However, at this stage we quit, as he himself says, the ground of experience and enter upon the ground of hope. But, by a sublime analogy, he fetches from the travail of the whole universe proof of the necessity and beneficence of the law of transformation. Christ entered into his glory when he had made his physical death itself a crowning witness to his obedience to righteousness; we, in like manner, within the limits of this earthly life and before we have yet persevered to the end, must not look for full adoption, for the glorious revelation in us of the sons of God.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE English journals are crowded with records of crimes, chiefly wife-murders.

MR. G. H. LEWES has just lost his second son, aged twenty-five, after a painful, lingering illness.

IN despatching the remains of Mr. Peabody to this country in an English man-of-war, Queen Victoria pays a truly royal tribute to the dead.

THE Lady's Own Paper, in announcing the retirement of Mr. Bigelow from the editorship of the N. E. Times, is very careful not to say anything about "The Biglow Papers."

* See Rom. vii. 1-6.

* According to the true reading in Phil. iii. 8.

A "HISTORY OF OPERAS," by M. Felix Clement, comprising the analysis and nomenclature of French and foreign works, from the origin of opera to our day, is commenced in the columns of Le Menestrel.

We publish in this number the first instalment of "The Death Penalty" (La Peine de Mort), by Jules Simon, translated expressly for EVERY SATURDAY. M. Simon's narrative is a model of pathetic art, and is just now the literary sensation in Paris.

AN enterprising British house-agent is vigorously advertising a villa which adjoins Mr. Tennyson's house, and is recommending it for the view it commands of the grounds of the Poet. The view of the Poet is not included in the lease, but is sold by implication.

FIGARO publishes a few figures showing the circulation of some of the most popular journals in France. The issue for last month was: Figaro, 1,704,000 copies; Peuple, 1,430,000; National, 1,200,000; Siccle, 1,050,000; Rappel, 930,000; Liberte, 450,000. The Peuple and National are sou papers, the former the organ of the Emperor, and the latter of the moderate party.

THE newspaper accounts of Lord Derby assert that he was the author of a little book for children in explanation of the Scripture parables. "This," says the Pall Mall Gazette, "is a mistake. The author of the work in question was either his father or his grandfather. We believe the claim is due to Edward, the twelfth Earl of Derby, who died in 1834, and was grandfather of the lately deceased statesman."

LE FIGARO says of Sainte Beuvé that few people ever wore mourning so often as he did. He made an ideal of the character and future of his famous contemporaries, which was seldom realized. When he perceived that he must renounce his chimera he put crape on his hat, and simply said, "Such an one is dead, and I am wearing mourning for him." Thus he mourned for Lamartine, Lamennais, Victor Hugo, Buloz, Chateaubriand, and Béranger.

THE following strange occurrence is vouched for by a South London magazine. It would appear that "at a concert given a short time since in Walworth a gentleman startled the audience by reciting Paul's defence in Greek. In order to keep up the idea of the apostle as a prisoner, the reciter was led on to the platform by a long heavy chain, which was bound round his waist. He did not however, consider it necessary to dispense with his white kid gloves. The Greek, the chain, and the gloves, together had a curious effect.

THE great improvements that have been lately introduced in all species of firearms are eclipsed by the discovery made by a Captain Piazza, who belongs to the Italian army, but who is ready to sell his invention to the first bidder. His object is the benevolent one of freeing the world of war. In a pamphlet now circulating among the officers of the army in Paris, entitled, "L'Abolition des Armées Permanentes," he endeavors to explain that by means of a small machine, which he is ready to sell for a few hundred francs, he can insure such precision of fire for large guns and small arms that the most ignorant man will be able to calculate without difficulty the distance of the object he is aiming at, and the height of the trajectory, and also be certain that he will hit his mark. True merit is so often unrecognized that no one will be surprised to hear Captain Piazza has as yet met with no purchaser of his machine, and is still open to a bid.

THE number of women studying medicine at the University of Zurich increases steadily in geometric progression. Four years ago there was but one, the next year there were two, the next year four, last year there were eight, and there are now sixteen. We are assured (it is true by a partisan of the movement) that none of the inconveniences which it was feared might arise from women being allowed to share the school with men have at present been experienced, the classes are as large as ever, and the dean reports that the innovation has undoubtedly improved the discipline of the school.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Times forwards a picturesque account of a sudden rise of the Nile which took place last month. He was sleeping in a house, in a village four miles south of the Pyramids, when he was awakened by a Bedouin, who warned him that the river was rising, and he fled first to the roof and afterwards to a rising ground, where the whole village had collected. The river rose steadily, "monopolizing even the noise," and as it rose, "house after house surged and came down with a dull souse into the water," amidst the wailings of the Arabs. With the last house, however, the wailings ceased, the men stood resigned, the women seemed to find the incident a relief from monotony, and the old Sheikh of the village went about gravely encouraging each in turn. The writer had constructed a raft, but the Sheikh thought Allah was merciful, the raft too frail, and the current too strong, and declined the responsibility. Aid, however, was procured at last, and the good-humored, patient people were rescued.

THE Pall Mall Gazette publishes a ghastly complaint from one of its innumerable correspondents. It is evidently Mr. Bob Sawyer who writes:—

"The scarcity of bodies supplied for dissection in our metropolitan medical schools is becoming more and more marked each year. Formerly, on the first day of October, which is the commencement of the medical session, bodies were in readiness on which the students might study anatomy practically; whereas, at the beginning of the present week only eight subjects in all had been distributed among the eleven metropolitan medical schools. If this want continue much longer, men will have to go to the continental schools, or the study of anatomy will be very imperfectly pursued, whereby the advancement of surgery will receive a mortal wound,—the public being the sufferers. Either the stringent 'Anatomy Act' must be revised, or existing impediments to a proper supply of subjects under its working must be removed. In Paris bodies can be obtained for dissection or for the practice of operations for five francs each, whilst in London they cost upwards of £3 each. The experiment of bringing up unclaimed bodies from the country workhouses has been attempted, but the expense attending their carriage to London has rendered it impracticable. Not many years ago a system of secret exportation was for some time successfully carried on from Liverpool to the Scottish medical schools, as great difficulty was experienced in obtaining them there otherwise. The conviction and punishment of the offenders under the prosecution of the late Sir Charles Crompton effectually put a stop to the proceeding, but gave rise to an increased amount of 'body-snatching.'

A WRITER in the Theatrical and Musical Review tells the following rather tough story of Malibran: "The famous Malibran almost always fainted at the conclusion of Otello. The reason of this was as follows: When quite a child she accompanied her father the famous Garcia, to New York, where he was engaged as tenor at the opera. One Monday he returned to his daughter, who was also his pupil, and informed her that the prima donna was seriously ill, and that she must be ready to play Desdemona on Wednesday. She knew the music perfectly, but as she had never sung on a public stage she naturally wished to get off this sudden and unexpected début; but Garcia would not hear of it. With a brutality which, by the way, was not unusual with him, he told her that she must sing the part, and that if she did not come up to his expectations he would kill her on the spot, for which purpose he should on that night take a real dagger instead of a stage one. The night arrived, and Malibran achieved quite a success. All went well until the last act. Then as Othello was stealing up to the recumbent Desdemona a shrill scream ran through the house, and Malibran, jumping up from the couch, rushed off the stage. The curtain was let down, and the opera came to an untimely end. It was soon discovered that Malibran was missing. Search was instituted for her by the police, but for two days she could not be found. Then she was discovered hiding behind some timber in a timber-yard half dead with fright and starvation. The effect of this, her first appearance in the part, was so indelibly imprinted on her recollection that whenever she sang it the circumstances came back to her and often resulted in a fainting fit at the close of the opera. As an intimate friend of Malibran's, who heard the story from her own lips, I can vouch for its authenticity."

A FLORENCE newspaper, L'Italie, extracts from the "Annales de la Médecine et de la Chirurgie Étrangère" the following extraordinary history, which is quite as ingenious as About's "Nose of a Notary," or his "Man with the Broken Ear." In relating the circumstances the Italian paper does not give implicit credence to the statement.

"On the 18th of April, 1868, in the prison of Villarcia (province of Minas-Geraes), in Brazil, two men named Aveiro and Carines were executed at the same time. In Brazil executions take place with closed doors, in the interior of the prison. Dr. Lorenzo y Carmo, of Rio Janeiro, well known by savans for his remarkable works on electricity applied to physiology, his surgical skill, and his success in autoplasmic operations, obtained permission to profit by this event in order to experiment on the power of electricity, and illustrate its analogy with some of the phenomena of life. The numerous experiments hitherto attempted have been made on the head and trunk separately. Dr. Lorenzo y Carmo's design was, if possible, to unite the head to the neck after decapitation. The heads of the two criminals fell within a few minutes of each other into the same basket; first that of Carines, then that of Aveiro. Immediately after this second execution a compression was effected by a pupil of Dr. Lorenzo on the carotid arteries of one of the heads so as to stop the hemorrhage. The body was then placed on a bed already prepared, and Dr. Lorenzo stuck the head as exactly as possible on the section and kept it in that position. The cells of a powerful electric pile were applied to the base of the neck and on the breast. Under this influence, as in former experiments, the respiratory movements were at once perceptible. As the blood, which penetrated in abundance through the surface of the scar, threatened to stop the passage of air, Dr. Lorenzo had recourse to tracheotomy. Respiration then ensued regularly. The head was fastened to the body by stitches and by a special apparatus. The physiologist wished to ascertain for how long a time this appearance of life could thus be artificially maintained. His astonishment was great when he saw that at the end of two hours not only did respiration still continue under the influence of the electric current, but that circulation had even resumed a certain regularity. The pulse beat feebly, but sensibly. The experiment was continued without intermission.

"At the end of sixty-two hours it was evident, to the astonishment of every one, that a process of cicatrization had commenced on the lips of the section. A little later signs of life manifested themselves spontaneously in the head and limbs till then deprived of motion. At this moment the director of the prison arriving for the first time in the experiment room observed that by a singular mistake, due to the haste of the operation, the head of Carines had been taken for that of Aveiro, and had been applied to the body of the latter. The experiment was continued notwithstanding. Three days later the respiratory movements reproduced themselves and electricity was suppressed. Dr. Lorenzo y Carmo, and his assistants were stupefied, frightened at a result so unexpected, and at the power of an agent which, in their hands, had restored life to a body whose right to exist the law had forfeited.

"The learned surgeon, who had only had in view a simple physiological experiment, employed all his skill to continue this work, which science, aided against all expectation by nature, had so singularly commenced. He assisted the process of cicatrization, which progressed under the most favorable conditions. By means of an œsophagian probe liquid nourishment was introduced into the stomach. At the end of about three months the cicatrization was complete, and motion, though still difficult, became more and more extended. At length, at the end of seven months and a half, Aveiro-Carines was able to rise and walk, feeling only a slight stiffness in the neck and a feebleness in the limbs.

"So ends this remarkable story. Who can tell the results of scientific investigation carried so far? In families natural defects may be remedied by readjusting heads and bodies not originally proportioned for each other, and human beings dissatisfied with their sex may, under the benevolent system of Dr. Lorenzo y Carmo repair the error of their origin. It will be a question for lawyers to determine to what nationality these future beings are to belong if head and body have previously owed a separate allegiance. But if the system holds good in violent deaths, surely it may be applied to deaths ensuing, as the coroners' juries have it, from natural causes. In this case we might preserve our statesmen and celebrities forever. Opponents of the system would, however, be found in heirs-apparent."

THE DEATH PENALTY.

A NARRATIVE.

BY JULES SIMON.

[Translated from the French by MR. W. H. HUNTINGTON for EVERY SATURDAY.]

PART SECOND.

I.

EVERY one knows that after the revolution of 1830, there was a sort of revival of chouannery in Brittany. I was then quite young, and could have only instincts and feelings in regard to political matters. For the rest, my father was republican, and I was so from obedience, awaiting my becoming so from study and reflection. My opinions rendered it easy for me to be impartial. They made me no enemies; my republicanism was tolerated as reverry is tolerated in a poet. My family had sent me to the college at Vannes, where I learned a little Latin and a little French under the direction of the Abbé Ropert, an excellent man, who did not know much of either. There were a hundred of us scholars in the second class, of whom I was the youngest, for in that country, which has perhaps advanced since, but was then behindhand with the world, the population of the colleges was made up, for the most part, of overgrown boys, removed from the plough by the vanity of their parents or the liberality of their curés to prepare themselves for the priesthood. I still remember my fellow-disciples, in short jacket and wooden shoes, with their long hair and their twenty-five years, but who, because they were collegians and because every condition of life has its privileges, were as thoroughly boys as myself. They were not so, however, in their political sentiments, and there was, perhaps, not one of them who was not chouan to the tips of his fingers. Our college had deserted in a body under the first revolution, to go and fight in the Landes under Cadoudal. Our superiors were not a little proud of this grand feat of arms of our predecessors, and took care to remind us of it from time to time, with a self-complacency that was quite infectious. It is not astonishing, therefore, that several of our fellows joined Guillemot's band during the vacation of 1831. At our return next term we younger ones had our ears filled with the marvellous recitals of their campaign. I venture to think that they were slightly embellished. There was one who had set fire to a barn; others had kept the field for days together against a company of movable gendarmery; others had plundered a diligence that was taking the money from the sub-collector at Ploërmel to Vannes. Guyomar, who was one of the most brilliant in the class of rhetoric, affirmed that he had held the conductor under his knee for more than half an hour; and although he had not his equal for turning a Latin verse, he was prouder of this nocturnal expedition than of his best distichs. I have always had a suspicion that he borrowed the most of his stirring reports from Jean Shogar, a novel that was an immense favorite with us, for he was by nature wholly averse to anything like disorder and violence. Then there was Raynal, who boasted of having torn down the tri-colored flag that hung over the door of the town-hall, with his own hand, in open day. Three officers of the customs wanted to prevent him, but he had shouted Vive le Roi! so vigorously, and all the fellows of Sarzeau and of Port Navalo had gathered about him so promptly, that the officers concluded resistance was quite impossible, and quietly sheathed their swords again.

The oldest of our comrades was a peasant from Saint Allouestre, who was to take orders in a few months. He had two brothers, one of whom, the oldest of the family, was a farmer, and the other, who was entering the third class, had just been drawn in the conscription of that year. The name of the brothers was Nayl, and although they were peasants they made a good figure among us, seeing that their father was something of a farmer and that they were admitted, on all hands, to be the best scholars in the college. They were never heard talking chouannery, and none could have told whether they were Whites or Blues. When Guyomar or another was narrating his exploits to an admiring circle, they stopped to listen like the rest, but without expressing their opinion, contenting themselves at the finest passages with exchanging a smile with each other. For the rest they were shy, quiet fellows, as properly behaved as girls, always exact to the hour, walking off by themselves on holidays, — for they were devoted to each other, — and so attentive to their religious duties that Abbé Flohy, the chaplain, always held them up to us as a model. They were my neighbors, lodging in the Rue des Chanoines, close by the cathedral in the house of a widow, who kept a table for eight or ten scholars. I have often been to see them in their little room, where they were all three crowded in, when the oldest brother came to town, and I sat on the bed seeing there were only three chairs.

We used to con our lessons together or read some book we had borrowed from one of the vicars of Saint Patern. We were entirely our own masters after class hours, yet I am sure we should not have been steadier or more studious if we had been shut up in a seminary. I should have laughed indeed, when we embraced each other the morning after the distribution of prizes before going home to our parents, if any one had told me that four months later I should see my three comrades sentenced to death.

II.

My family was then living in Belle Isle. The lugger that brought me back at the opening of term was obliged to beat through the Morbihan, and could not enter the channel till about nine in the morning. I was late for the mass of the Saint Esprit, and went straight from the boat to the chapel. My first care as soon as I reached my seat was to cast a glance around in search of my friends, but I could discover them nowhere, which greatly surprised me; for none of us ventured on liberties with the regulations, and nothing short of serious illness was excuse for absence. Several of my comrades at a distance answered my cheerful nods of recognition with a grave air that increased my uneasiness. I was on nettles till the end of the ceremony, and did not wait till we were out of the church to ask Guyomar what had become of the Nayls, and if there was anything new.

"Then you know nothing at Belle Isle of what is going on?" he asked.

"Why, no," I replied; "we have heard of the murder at Bignan; but no other news from the Continent has reached us."

"Exactly," said he, "it is just that death of M. Brossard which makes us all so sad, and we cannot yet understand how the Nayls could have done it."

"The Nayls!" I exclaimed; "and what have they to do with this horrible affair?" For even after Guyomar's words my mind still would not take in the idea that he accused them of being the assassins. When he repeated the charge, adding that the three brothers were in prison, and that they would be tried at the coming assizes, I felt my blood chill; everything turned about me, and I fell fainting on the steps of the chapel. I was carried to my lodgings, where I lay helpless for some hours. As soon as I had recovered strength enough to rise, I went to M. Le Névé, our principal, hoping still that I had been deceived, and wishing, at any rate, to be enlightened about the matter, and learn all the details.

I had no need to question him; for as soon as he saw me he came forward, giving me his hand and weeping. "But they are innocent," he said; "I would take my oath of it, and yet appearances are all against them. I am summoned as witness. I will do them justice. I will tell all the good I know of them. Children that I have brought up, whom I have known for these ten years, and who are an example for the whole college, cannot be murderers. Have no fear, we will save them. Jourdan has promised me to save them."

Although the principal's confident assurances did not entirely remove my anxiety, they helped to calm my agitation. I learned that the family had arrived in Vannes two days before, and hastened to call on them. There were the father and mother, and the wife of the eldest son, who was already married, although he was but twenty-four years old. I found the women seated in a corner, their aprons thrown over their heads and weeping bitterly. The old man was standing, holding his penbach in his hand, his gaze fixed and vacant. As I entered the women broke out in louder wailing, interrupted by heart-rending sobs. The father grasped my hand and held it long in his. Finally, I led him near the only window, and making a great effort to speak, for my heart was choking my throat, I said, "Are they guilty?" He hardly moved his lips, and uttered but a single phrase. It made me shudder. The father had answered, "I believe so."

III.

I was beginning to believe so too, while constantly repeating to myself, "We will save them!" M. Le Névé had informed me of two or three circumstances that threw me into terrible doubt. He had told me that Father Nayl was a determined chouan, whose hostility was so notorious that the prefect had placed a guard in his house to watch his movements. Jean Pierre, the third son, had reached the age for military conscription that year. We had supposed, from the number that he drew, that he was exonerated from military service. It proved, on the contrary, when the reviewing commission had completed their examinations, to be within the limits of the draft allotted to his district. He had immediately left his father's house to avoid serving, and his two brothers had followed him. In that and the preceding year, at least one fourth of the young soldiers had deserted rather than be enrolled among the Blues, and there were several bands of refractories roving through the country, tracked from village to village by the movable gendarmery. This little troop, swollen by numerous tributary malcontents, and by such as cherished the hope of reviving the chouannery, was usually broken up into bands of fifteen or twenty, but gathered together sometimes, to the number of seven or eight hundred, whether to count their forces or essay some bold adventure.

Every peasant was their friend, and when, toward nightfall, three knocks were heard on the window, the farmer hastened to open the door, which was well barricaded within as soon as they entered. The farmer's wife then put buckwheat cakes, bread, pork, and a pitcher of cider on the table; the farm hands filled their pipes for them, cleaned their guns, renewed their supplies, and drew out for them from the common chest their best shoes, gaiters, coats, whatever could soften the hardship of their lives. When supper was over they recited the prayer together. Then the women went to bed, and the men, blowing out the resin candle, sat before the fireplace, speaking evil of government and discussing plans of vengeance and insurrection. Often such meetings were broken in on by the barking of a dog, that announced the approach of strangers. Then every man sprang to his gun, and the master of the house went up to the garret window to try to see what was going on without. If it was the gendarmes, they counted them and counted themselves. Oftenest they tried to fly, to hide under the hay, to make a hole in the thatch of the roof and escape by the rear of the house, while the door was getting itself slowly opened. But sometimes they appealed to force, and the gendarmes found themselves caught in a trap. Blood had flowed in many a rencounter, and, as it befalls in civil wars, there was hatred on both sides,—a hatred that grew day by day. The soldiers kept count of the comrades they had lost; the refractories, by dint of living in outlawry and gun in hand, took on more savageness of manners. A fact of quite recent occurrence had exasperated them. It had been reported and repeated throughout the country that the government of July had abolished the penalty of the galleys for political offences. Nevertheless, Nagat and the two brothers Jégu, who had stopped the mail-coach between Ploërmel and Malestroît, had been condemned to hard labor for twenty years. It was lost breath for the Blues to say that it was a case of plotted robbery committed at night on the highway; Breton peasants were deaf of that ear. They knew that the Jégus were refractories, that the government money taken from the mail had been remitted intact to the military chest of the little insurrectionary army. The crime, then, that had sent their friends to the galleys at Brest was evidently a political crime. It was evident, then, that government combined trick with brute force in the means it used against them. They were killed and they were cheated; conflagrations and assassinations were the response to this and some other condemnations of a like kind. At that moment, perhaps, there needed only an able, enterprising man to give the agitation formidable development.

Orders had been given to all the mayors to denounce to the superior authorities the refractories who were in hiding in their communes. This order was posted at the door of all the town halls. Within an hour, just beneath the official placard, another was to be read, in which all mayors who obeyed the orders of government were threatened with death. At Landévant, a small commune near Hennebont, this daring menace was openly posted just after vespers, in presence of all the village and of the mayor's adjunct, who did not dare to open his mouth.

Nothing was more precarious than the position of these magistrates, the most of whom had not at their command a gendarme, or a custom-house officer, or so much as an ordinary country policeman. Some of them were at heart with the insurgents, and warned them in advance of the approach of the gendarmes. There were villages where it was hard to find a single Blue; in others the mayor was the only functionary who knew how to read. M. Lorois, the prefect, had conceived it to be a wise policy to appoint to municipal offices, everywhere that it was possible, old soldiers either of the Republic or of the Empire. But such men, so lately released from proscription, so unexpectedly become magistrates, wanted both social authority and confidence in themselves. It was necessary to bring both menaces and promises to bear in order to obtain from them here and there some timid notifications.

Once or twice the king's attorney came to know through them of the rendezvous of a band, and was able to effect some arrests. The chouans resolved to take vengeance on the informers in a way that should produce a striking effect. I say the chouans; perhaps I am wrong, but at any rate they took that name, formerly made illustrious by noble daring, which many of them, doubtless, moved by love of evil-doing, void of any political faith, were unworthy to bear.

Bignan is a large burg of the canton of Saint Jean Brévelay, not far from Locminé. It has a considerable trade in hemp and cattle, so that it is the residence of six or eight large dealers, half peasants, half bourgeois, who go only to the first mass of a Sunday, and have the reputation, not without reason, of being violent Blues. M. Brossard, an ex-official in the revenue department, deprived of his post under Charles X., was the best educated man of this little group. He had been appointed mayor after the 29th of July, and had distinguished himself in the first year of his administration by refusing to march behind the canopy, girt with his official scarf, in the procession of the Fête Dieu. An act which, as a necessary consequence, made him the oracle of all the Blues of Bignan and its vicinity, and an object of execration to the chouans. His friends warned him to have a care of himself; but he paid no heed to their counsels, and could be met with at any time alone in the high-banked roads outside the village, where it is as easy to kill a man as to shoot at a target.

When the notice from the prefecture relative to the refractories reached him, he resolved to post it himself after the grand mass, and to make a speech to the people. He was rather given to such displays, for he was much of an orator, and, like all men who are conscious of their gift of eloquence, he was fond of speaking. He awaited, then, the close of the grand mass, and when the bell had rung for the Angelus, which they always say in Brittany after the Te missa est before the congregation disperses, he marched out solemnly from the town-house, preceded by the town drummer and a little boy of twelve years or so, whom he styled his secretary. First, he ordered the ban to be beaten, then he took off his cap, mounted on a great stone, read aloud the proclamation of the prefect, made boast of having himself instigated it, and closed with a most emphatic declaration of his zeal to obey its injunctions, and of his determination to purge the commune of the brigands by whom it was infested.

Eight of these brigands were present right in front of him, with their friends and relatives; and it was at their choice to have made an end of the mayor then and there. He was perfectly aware of the fact; but he did not blench for an instant under their fierce glances. He fastened the placard to the wall with his own hands, descended from his pedestal, carefully folded up his tricolored scarf, put it in his pocket, and walked straight up to that one of the refractories who passed for the chief of the band.

"Well, Jean Brien," he said, "you have heard! You know what is left for you to do. I give you twenty-four hours to be off. If at the end of twenty-four hours you are not out of the commune, I write to the King's prosecuting attorney, and shall have you seized in your bed."

"You will not do that, M. Brossard," said Jean Brien. "You are a Blue, but you were born in our country. You know very well that I am at my father's; you will not inform against me."

"I will denounce you—you and the rest—as sure as there is a God," replied M. Brossard; "so you are fully warned."

No one took up the word. The mayor pushed his way through the crowd with some difficulty, and crossed the street to enter a wine shop, where he seated himself to play a game of cards with the revenue collector and an itinerant merchant, named Gautron, who had come to Bignan for the approaching fair.

The peasants remained for a long time in compact groups about the door of the town-house. But no one touched the proclamation, or even attempted, as had been done elsewhere, to affix a seditious one beneath it. The wine shops did a poor business that day, for no one quitted the churchyard between mass and vespers. All the peasants remained there, motionless, not talking among themselves, not crying out, the men standing, the women seated on the tombstones. The mother of Jean Brien approached him two or three times, and motioned to take him by the arm. He gently put her off, and drew aside with the other refractories. At the last stroke of the vesper bell everybody entered the church. The mayor then came to the door of the wine shop, looked across to his intact hand-bill, and turning to his confederates with profound satisfaction, remarked, "All that is wanted is to have a little firmness."

The Hemp Fair fell on the following Wednesday, and the gendarmes of Plumelec were to come to Bignan for the day. Under the circumstances, however, no one was surprised to see arrive as early as Tuesday a score of men of the 43d of the line, headed by a sergeant, and as many movable gendarmes.

The mayor made himself very busy with the installing of his garrison. He kept the sub-officers to supper, and advised them that the refractories had not quitted the commune, that they had assembled at Kerdroguen, about half a league distant, in the house of a rich miller, who had more than once joined them in the field during the past year; that young men strangers to the country, had been seen slipping through the garden into the mill; that there were, perhaps, twenty of them in all, — well armed for the most part, — and that it was necessary to arrest them that night, because they might find defenders among the peasants, who would be flocking along the roads from early morning of the next day.

The adjunct, who had been a sergeant in the army, undertook to guide the soldiers and the movable gendarmes through the fields, so as to take the mill in the rear, while the gendarmes from Plumelec should come up by the road straight to the door. As for the mayor, he declared himself fully competent to do all the police service of the burg alone, until the return of the expedition. This was rather a rash promise, for in the Breton villages on fair days the population is astir by four o'clock in the morning. There is unpacking of merchandise and setting up of stalls; slices of pork begin to sing in the frying-pans; the cider-barrels are tapped; the blind and the halt lift up their voices; the mountebanks are nailing together their booth with loud hammer-strokes, and the cattle mingle their lowing with the noisy confusion. But M. Brossard was only the more delighted at having so fine an opportunity for the display of his zeal and activity. After the departure of his guests he threw himself on his bed without undressing, recommended his adjunct to wake him as soon as the prisoners were brought in and fell peacefully asleep.

The night was dark. The soldiers went out of the village in different directions, and reassembled at a little distance. They were not a quarter of an hour in reaching Kerdroguen, and about midnight the house was surrounded. Hidden behind a clump of apple-trees that grew almost to a level with the roof, — the mill being at the base of a slope, — the adjunct discerned the officer from Plumelec arriving with his four men, and heard him knock at the door of the mill. Immediately a dog fell a-barking; but no one answered from within. The men in ambuscade put their hands on their gunlocks and held themselves ready at the slightest signal to run to the aid of their comrades. No movement was discoverable in or about the house, and when the dog ceased barking, nothing was heard but the gurgling of the water under the paddles of the wheel.

During this expectant interval, which lasted a full quarter of an hour, the officer repeatedly beat on the door, calling to the miller by name, and warning him that he should be obliged to use force if it were not presently opened. At last, receiving no answer, he gave orders to break in the door. At this moment most of the soldiers hastened up to lend their aid to the operation, but the door yielded at the first blow, and the company entered.

Within all was dark as an oven. The adjunct struck fire, and some resin candles were soon lighted. A careful search then began in the first chamber. The table-cloth was on the great chest with the plates and mugs; it was evident that fifteen or twenty persons had supped there. Two beds, one placed above the other, as is usual in Breton cottages, had not been disturbed. Of the four or five guns that ordinarily garnished the chimney, not one was to be seen.

Suddenly steps were heard in the upper story. The room where the soldiers were immediately became as silent as the grave. All raised their eyes to the ill-jointed planks that served for a ceiling; they seemed to see the muzzle of a gun in every crack. A rickety ladder led to the upper floor. The sergeant rushed to it, like a soldier who sees a bomb fall within ten paces of his company and devotes his life to save his comrades. Some resolute men followed him. They raised the trap-door, and found themselves in the upper story of the mill, in presence of the mother and wife of the miller. In this fortress, so easy of defence, there was no other garrison. They groped under the beds and the chests, ransacked every corner of the mill, thrust their swords into more than one sack of grain, tried the lathes that sustained the thatch, to make sure they were firmly nailed and had not let the fugitives escape by the roof. At last, it was proved past doubting that the band had left before they reached the mill. The affair was a hopeless failure. The sergeant cried for rage. He was the last to leave, and wanted to go down the bank to see if any one were concealed along the stream. He had to be forced away and reasoned into something like calmness.

It was now nearly three in the morning, so minute and persistent had been the examination of the localities. The troops resumed the route to Bignan, on the active lookout all the way, questioning the trees and thickets with watchful eye. No discovery rewarded their vigilance. There was nothing left for it but to wake up the mayor and report their disappointment.

IV.

M. Brossard dwelt in the centre of the burg. He occupied a small new house having two windows on the street. On the ground-floor were two rooms, — a kitchen on one side, and a dining room on the other, separated by an entry-way and staircase.

The mayor's chamber was above the dining-room; a large room adjoining this chamber was unoccupied, and contained only two or three large clothes-presses. Above, in an unpartitioned garret, slept the old peasant woman, utterly deaf, who kept the house in order, and occasionally did a little cooking when M. Brossard did not dine at the White Horse. The main door opening on the street was never closed with more than the latch. A bell within, which was set in motion by the opening of the door, sufficed for the protection of M. Brossard, in a country where they commit a murder sometimes, but where they almost never rob. On a shelf in the entry were a lantern and matches, at hand for the mayor when he came home after nightfall.

The adjunct, who knew the ways of the house, left the soldiers stationed before the door, went in with the three non-commissioned officers, lighted the lantern, ascended the staircase, and came near falling against the chamber door. At the instant, the brigadier of gendarmery suddenly caught him by the arm.

"Here is water on the floor," he said.

The adjunct looked and saw a puddle at his feet. He quickly held down the lantern and uttered a loud cry. His three companions had stooped at the same time as himself, and were all three regarding this pool with horror.

The brigadier was the first to rise.

"It is blood," he said; "there has been mischief here!" They burst at once into the sleeping-room of the mayor.

Except a penetrating offensive odor, they remarked at first nothing unusual. The furniture was not deranged; the white curtains fell on both sides of the bed where the mayor was lying. They approached him and saw that the sheets were spotted with blood, but they had been carefully spread over the body. The adjunct laid his hand upon it; it was already cold. When he raised the sheet to feel the heart, the three officers uttered a cry of horror. There was the proclamation, threatening the chovans, fastened with a knife thrust in the victim's breast. The gendarme from Plumelec, who had had experience in drawing up the preparatory report in similar cases, now set about examining the room. He went to the secretary; the key was in the lock and he opened it. Everything was in order; the money was untouched in the drawer. A chest of drawers, containing linen and other effects, had not been disturbed. A writing-table of stained wood was in the state M. Brossard had left it. The pens, inkstand, pencils, paper were arranged in the same order they had been left in over night. The floor was covered with mud and blood; it was evident that more than fifteen persons had entered there, and that they came from walking in wet roads. Traces even were observed of the kind of clayey earth that is found on this Kerdroguen road. The marks of heavy nailed shoes and wooden shoes were still visible in the moist dirt, where the butts of guns had also left their traces. The officer searched under the bed, turned up the foot-rug by the side of it, and shook the curtains, without finding anything that might lead to a knowledge of who were the guilty actors. It was only at the moment of quitting the room that the adjunct perceived behind a chair a hat that he did not recognize as having belonged to the mayor. He took it up, and, examining it by the light of the lantern, could see the following words written on the inside: "Jean Pierre Nayl, student in the College at Vannes, Rue des Chanoines, No. 17."

While the above researches were carried on, the gendarmes and soldiers were scouring the country on all sides. Among the attendants at the fair next day, sentiments were divided. Some approved the assassination; the larger number blamed it; the legitimists in particular loudly expressed their indignation; no one, however, stirred a foot to aid the gendarmes in their search. Jean Brien, who was looked on as the leader of the enterprise, could not be found; but they succeeded in laying hands on Jean Pierre Nayl and his two brothers.

It was proved that he had set out with them to join the band of Bignan four days before the murder. They were arrested at a charcoal burner's hut within gunshot of Saint Allouestre. They made no resistance and quietly submitted to be conducted to the jail at Vannes. Everybody knew them in the Rue du Mené and everybody pitied them as they passed there in open day, the three tied to each other by a rope. Widow Guillemin, at whose house they lodged, had the courage to go and kiss them in the middle of the street, and tell them she had no doubt of their innocence.

It was known at Vannes, a few days after, that on the Sunday preceding the murder, old Father Nayl had declared before all the world on the bowling-ground, that if a mayor denounced refractories he ought to have his business settled for him; that it would be a right thing to do, and that he only hoped, if his sons were denounced, that they might have time to revenge themselves before they were caught.

MARY GRESLEY.

AN EDITOR'S STORY.

BY ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

WE have known many prettier girls than Mary Gresley, and many handsomer women,—but we never knew girl or woman gifted with a face which in supplication was more assuasive, in grief more sad, in mirth more merry. It was a face that compelled sympathy, and it did so with the conviction on the mind of the sympathizer that the girl was altogether unconscious of her own power. In her intercourse with us there was, alas! much more of sorrow than of mirth, and we may truly say that in her sufferings we suffered; but still there came to us from our intercourse with her much of delight mingled with the sorrow; and that delight arose, partly no doubt, from her woman's charms,—from the bright eye, the beseeching mouth, the soft little hand, and the feminine grace of her unpretending garments,—but chiefly, we think, from the extreme humanity of the girl. She had, little, indeed none, of that which the world calls society, but yet she was pre-eminently social. Her troubles were very heavy, but she was making ever an unconscious effort to throw them aside, and to be jocund in spite of their weight. She would even laugh at them, and at herself as bearing them. She was a little fair-haired creature, with broad brow and small nose and dimpled chin, with no brightness of complexion, no luxuriance of hair, no swelling glory of bust and shoulders; but with a pair of eyes which, as they looked at you, would be gemmed always either with a tear or with some spark of laughter, and with a mouth in the corners of which was ever lurking some little spark of humor, unless when some unspoken prayer seemed to be hanging on her lips. Of woman's vanity she had absolutely none. Of her corporeal self, as having charms to rivet man's love, she thought no more than does a dog. It was a fault with her that she lacked that quality of womanhood. To be loved was to her all the world; unconscious desire for the admiration of men was as strong in her as in other women; and her instinct taught her, as such instincts do teach all women, that such love and admiration were to be the fruit of what feminine gifts she possessed; but the gifts on which she depended — depending on them without thinking on the matter — were her softness, her trust, her woman's weakness, and that power of supplicating by her eye without putting her petition into words which was absolutely irresistible. Where is the man of fifty, who in the course of his life has not learned to love some woman simply because it has come in his way to help her, and to be good to her in her struggles? And if added to that source of affection there be brightness, some spark of humor, social gifts, and a strong flavor of that which we have ventured to call humanity, such love may become almost a passion without the addition of much real beauty.

But in thus talking of love we must guard ourselves somewhat from miscomprehension. In love with Mary Gresley, after the common sense of the word, we never were, nor would it have become us to be so. Had such a state of being unfortunately befallen us, we certainly should be silent on the subject. We were married and old; she was very young, and engaged to be married, always talking to us of her engagement as a thing fixed as the stars. She looked upon us, no doubt, — after she had ceased to regard us simply in our editorial capacity, — as a subsidiary old uncle whom Providence had supplied to her, in order, that if it were possible, the troubles of her life might be somewhat eased by assistance to her from that special quarter. We regarded her first almost as a child, and then as a young woman to whom we owed that sort of protecting care which a graybeard should ever be ready to give to the weakness of feminine adolescence. Nevertheless, we were in love with her, and we think such a state of love to be a wholesome and natural condition. We might, indeed, have loved her grandmother, — but the love would have been very different. Had circumstances brought us into connection with her grandmother, we hope we should have done our duty, and had that old lady been our friend, we should, we trust, have done it with alacrity. But in our intercourse with Mary Gresley there was more than that. She charmed us. We learned to love the hue of that dark gray stuff frock which she seemed always to wear. When she would sit in the low arm-chair opposite to us, looking up into our eyes as we spoke to her words which must often have stabbed her little heart, we were wont to caress her with that inward undemonstrative embrace that one spirit is able to confer upon another. We thought of her constantly, perplexing our mind for her succor. We forgave all her faults. We exaggerated her virtues. We exerted ourselves for her with a zeal that was perhaps fatuous. Though we attempted sometimes to look black at her, telling her that our time was too precious to be wasted in conversation with her, she soon learned to know how welcome she was to us. Her glove — which, by the by, was never tattered, though she was very poor — was an object of regard to us. Her grandmother's gloves would have been as unacceptable to us as any other morsel of old kid or cotton. Our heart bled for her. Now the heart may suffer much for the sorrows of a male friend, but it may hardly for such be said to bleed. We loved her, in short, as we should not have loved her, but that she was young and gentle, and could smile, — and, above all, but that she looked at us with those bright, beseeching, tear-laden eyes.

Sterne, in his latter days, when very near his end, wrote passionate love-letters to various women, and has been called hard names by Thackeray, — not for writing them, but because he thus showed himself to be incapable of that sincerity which should have bound him to one love. We do not ourselves much admire the sentimentalism of Sterne, finding the expression of it to be mawkish, and thinking that too often he misses the pathos for which he strives from a want of appreciation on his own part of that which is really vigorous in language and touching in sentiment. But we think that Thackeray has been somewhat wrong in throwing that blame on Sterne's heart which should have been attributed to his taste. The love which he declared when he was old and sick and dying — a worn-out wreck of a man — disgusts us, not because it was felt, or not felt, but because it was told; — and told as though the teller meant to offer more than that warmth of sympathy which woman's strength and woman's weakness combined will ever produce in the hearts of certain men. This is a sympathy with which neither age, nor crutches, nor matrimony, nor position of any sort need consider itself to be incompatible. It is unreasoning, and perhaps irrational. It gives to outward form and grace that which only inward merit can deserve. It is very dangerous because, unless watched, it leads to words which express that which is not intended. But, though it may be controlled, it cannot be killed. He, who is of his nature open to such impression, will feel it while breath remains to him. It was that which destroyed the character and happiness of Swift, and which made Sterne contemptible. We do not doubt that such unreasoning sympathy, exacted by feminine attraction, was always strong in Johnson's heart; but Johnson was strong over all, and could guard himself equally from misconduct and from ridicule. Such sympathy with women, such incapability of withstanding the feminine magnet was very strong with Goethe, who could guard himself from ridicule, but not from misconduct. To us the child of whom we are speaking — for she was so then — was ever a child. But she bore in her hand the power of that magnet, and we admit that the needle within our bosom was swayed by it. Her story — such as we have to tell it — was as follows.

Mary Gresley, at the time when we first knew her, was eighteen years old, and was the daughter of a medical practitioner, who had lived and died in a small town in one of the northern counties. For facility in telling our story we will call that town Cornboro. Dr. Gresley, as he seemed to have been called, though without proper claim to the title, had been a diligent man, and fairly successful, — except in this, that he died before he had been able to provide for those whom he left behind him. The widow still had her own modest fortune, amounting to some eighty pounds a year; and that, with the furniture of her house, was her whole wealth, when she found herself thus left with the weight of the world upon her shoulders. There was one other daughter older than Mary, whom we never saw, but who was always mentioned as poor Fanny. There had been no sons, and the family consisted of the mother and the two girls. Mary had been only fifteen when her father died, and up to that time had been regarded quite as a child by all who had known her. Mrs. Gresley, in the hour of her need, did as widows do in such cases. She sought advice from her clergyman and neighbors, and was counselled to take a lodger into her house. No lodger could be found so fitting as the curate, and when Mary was seventeen years old, she and the curate were engaged to be married. The curate paid thirty pounds a year for his lodgings, and on this, with their own little income, the widow and her two daughters had managed to live. The engagement was known to them all as soon as it had been known to Mary. The love-making, indeed, had gone on beneath the eyes of the mother. There had been not only no deceit, no privacy, no separate interests, but, as far as we ever knew, no question as to prudence in the making of the engagement. The two young people had been brought together, had loved each other, as was so natural, and had become engaged as a matter of course. It was an event as easy to be foretold, or at least as easy to be believed, as the pairing of two birds. From what we heard of this curate, the Rev. Arthur Donne, — for we never saw him, — we fancy that he was a simple, pious, commonplace young man, imbued with a strong idea that in being made a priest he had been invested with a nobility and with some special capacity beyond that of other men, slight in body, weak in health, but honest, true, and warm-hearted. Then, the engagement having been completed, there arose the question of matrimony. The salary of the curate was a hundred a year. The whole income of the vicar, an old man, was, after payment made to his curate, two hundred a year. Could the curate, in such circumstances, afford to take to himself a penniless wife of seventeen? Mrs. Gresley was willing that the marriage should take place, and that they should all do as best they might on their joint income. The vicar's wife, who seems to have been a strong-minded, sage, though somewhat hard woman, took Mary aside, and told her that such a thing must not be. There would come, she said, children, and destitution, and ruin. She knew perhaps more than Mary knew when Mary told us her story, sitting opposite to us in the low arm-chair. It was the advice of the vicar's wife that the engagement should be broken off; but that, if the breaking of the engagement were impossible, there should be an indefinite period of waiting. Such engagements cannot be broken off. Young hearts will not consent to be thus torn asunder. The vicar's wife was too strong for them to get themselves married in her teeth, and the period of indefinite waiting was commenced.

And now for a moment we will go farther back among Mary's youthful days. Child as she seemed to be, she had in very early years taken a pen in her hand. The reader need hardly be told that had not such been the case there would not have arisen any cause for friendship between her and me. We are telling an Editor's tale, and it was in our editorial capacity that Mary first came to us. Well, — in her earliest attempts, in her very young days, she wrote, — Heaven knows what; poetry first no doubt; then, God help her, a tragedy; after that, when the curate-influence first commenced, tales for the conversion of the ungodly; — and at last, before her engagement was a fact, having tried her wing at fiction, in the form of those false little dialogues between Tom the Saint and Bob the Sinner, she had completed a novel in one volume. She was then seventeen, was engaged to be married, and had completed her novel! Passing her in the street you would almost have taken her for a child to whom you might give an orange.

Hitherto her work had come from ambition, — or from a feeling of somewhat restless piety inspired by the curate. Now there arose in her young mind the question whether such talent as she possessed might not be turned to account for ways and means, and used to shorten, perhaps absolutely to annihilate, that uncertain period of waiting. The first novel was seen by "a man of letters" in her neighborhood, who pronounced it to be very clever; — not indeed fit as yet for publication, faulty in grammar, faulty even in spelling, — how I loved the tear that shone in her eye as she confessed this delinquency! — faulty of course in construction, and faulty in character; — but still clever. The man of letters had told her that she must begin again.

Unfortunate man of letters in having thrust upon him so terrible a task! In such circumstances what is the candid, honest, soft-hearted man of letters to do? "Go, girl, and mend your stockings. Learn to make a pie. If you work hard, it may be that some day your intellect will suffice to you to read a book and understand it. For the writing of a book that shall either interest or instruct a brother human being many gifts are required. Have you just reason to believe that they have been given to you?" That is what the candid, honest man of letters says who is not soft-hearted; — and in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it will probably be the truth. The soft-hearted man of letters remembers that this case may be the hundredth; and, unless the blotted manuscript submitted to him is conclusive against such possibility, he reconciles it to his conscience to tune his counsel to that hope. Who can say that he is wrong? Unless such evidence be conclusive, who can venture to declare that this aspirant may not be the one who shall succeed? Who in such emergency does not remember the day in which he also was one of the hundred of whom the ninety-and-nine must fail? — and will not remember also the many convictions on his own mind that he certainly would not be the one appointed? The man of letters in the neighborhood of Cornboro to whom poor Mary's manuscript was shown was not sufficiently hard-hearted to make any strong attempt to deter her. He made no reference to the easy stockings, or the wholesome pie, — pointed out the manifest faults which he saw, and added — we do not doubt with much more energy than he threw into his words of censure — his comfortable assurance that there was great promise in the work. Mary Gresley that evening burned the manuscript, and began another, with the dictionary close at her elbow.

Then, during her work, there occurred two circumstances which brought upon her — and indeed, upon the household to which she belonged — intense sorrow and greatly increased trouble. The first of these applied more especially to herself. The Rev. Arthur Donne did not approve of novels, — of other novels than those dialogues between Tom and Bob, of the falsehood of which he was unconscious, — and expressed a desire that the writing of them should be abandoned. How far the lover went in his attempt to enforce obedience we, of course, could not know; but he pronounced the edict, and the edict, though not obeyed, created tribulation. Then there came forth another edict which had to be obeyed, — an edict from the probable successor of the late Dr. Gresley, — ordering the poor curate to seek employment in some clime more congenial to his state of health than that in which he was then living. He was told that his throat and lungs and general apparatus for living and preaching were not strong enough for those hyperborean springs, and that he must seek a southern climate. He did do so, and, before I became acquainted with Mary, had transferred his services to a small town in Dorsetshire. The engagement, of course, was to be as valid as ever, though matrimony must be postponed, more indefinitely even than heretofore. But if Mary could write novels and sell them, then how glorious would it be to follow her lover into Dorsetshire! The Rev. Arthur Donne went, and the curate who came in his place was a married man, wanting a house, and not lodgings. So Mary Gresley persevered with her second novel, and completed it before she was eighteen.

The literary friend in the neighborhood — to the chance of whose acquaintance I was indebted for my subsequent friendship with Mary Gresley — found this work to be a great improvement on the first. He was an elderly man, who had been engaged nearly all his life in the conduct of a scientific and agricultural periodical, and was the last man whom I should have taken as a sound critic on works of fiction; but with spelling, grammatical construction, and the composition of sentences he was acquainted; and he assured Mary that her progress had been great. Should she burn that second story? she asked him. She would if he so recommended, and begin another the next day. Such was not his advice. "I have a friend in London," said he, "who has to do with such things, and you shall go to him. I will give you a letter." He gave her the fatal letter, and she came to us.

She came up to town with her novel; but not only with her novel, for she brought her mother with her. So great was her eloquence, so excellent her suasive power either with her tongue or by that look of supplication in her face, that she induced her mother to abandon her home in Cornboro, and trust herself to London lodgings. The house was let furnished to the new curate, and when I first heard of the Gresleys they were living on the second floor in a small street near to the Euston Square station. Poor Fanny, as she was called, was left in some humble home at Cornboro, and Mary travelled up to try her fortune in the great city. When we came to know her well we expressed our doubts as to the wisdom of such a step. Yes, the vicar's wife had been strong against the move. Mary confessed as much. That lady had spoken most forcible words, had uttered terrible predictions, had told sundry truths. But Mary had prevailed and the journey was made, and the lodgings were taken.

We can now come to the day on which we first saw her. She did not write, but came direct to us with her manuscript in her hand. "A young woman, sir, wants to see you," said the clerk, in that tone to which we were so well accustomed, and which indicated the dislike which he had learned from us to the reception of unknown visitors.

"Young woman! What young woman?"

"Well, sir, she is a very young woman, — quite a girl like."

"I suppose she has got a name. Who sent her? I cannot see any young woman without knowing why. What does she want?"

"Got a manuscript in her hand, sir."

"I've no doubt she has and a ton of manuscript in drawers and cupboards. Tell her to write. I won't see any woman, young or old, without knowing who she is." The man retired, and soon returned with an envelope belonging to the office, on which was written, "Miss Mary Gresley, late of Cornboro." He also brought me a note from "the man of letters" down in Dorsetshire. "Of what sort is she?" I asked, looking at the introduction.

"She ain't amiss as to looks," said the clerk; "and she's modest-like." Now certainly it is the fact that all female literary aspirants are not "modest-like." We read our friend's letter through while poor Mary was standing at the counter below. How eagerly should we have run to greet her, to save her from the gaze of the public, to welcome her at least with a chair and the warmth of our editorial fire, had we guessed then what were her qualities! It was not long before she knew the way up to our sanctum without any clerk to show her, and not long before we knew well the sound of that low but not timid knock at our door, made, always with the handle of the parasol, with which her advent was heralded. We will confess that there was always music to our ears in that light tap from the little round wooden knob. The man of letters in Dorsetshire, whom we had known well for many years, had been never known to us with intimacy. We had bought with him and sold with him, had talked with him, and, perhaps, walked with him; but he was not one with whom we had eaten or drunk, or prayed. A dull, well-instructed, honest man he was, fond of his money, and, as we had thought, as unlikely as any man to be waked to enthusiasm by the ambitious dreams of a young girl. But Mary had been potent even over him, and he had written to me, saying that Miss Gresley was a young lady of exceeding promise, in respect of whom he had a strong presentiment that she would rise, if not to eminence, at least to a good position as a writer. "But she is very young," he added. Having read this letter, we at last desired our clerk to send the lady up.

We remember her step as she came to the door timid enough then, — hesitating but yet with an assumed lightness, as though she was determined to show us that she was not ashamed of what she was doing. She had on her head a light straw hat such as then was very unusual in London, — and is not now; we believe, commonly worn in the streets of the metropolis by ladies who believe themselves to know what they are about. But it was a hat worn up on her head, and not a straw plate done up with ribbons, and reaching down the incline of the forehead as far as the top of the nose. And she was dressed in a gray stuff frock, with a little black band round her waist. As far as our memory goes, we never saw her in any other dress, or with other hat or bonnet on her head. "And what can we do for you, — Miss Gresley?" we said, standing up and holding the literary gentleman's letter in our hand. We had almost said, "my dear," seeing her youth and remembering our own age. We were afterwards glad that we had not so addressed her; though it came before long that we did call her "my dear,"—in quite another spirit.

She recoiled a little from the tone of our voice, but recovered herself at once. "Mr. — thinks that you can do something for me. I have written a novel, and I have brought it to you."

"You are very young, are you not, to have written a novel?"

"I am young," she said, "but perhaps older than you think. I am eighteen." Then for the first time there came into her eye that gleam of a merry humor which never was allowed to dwell there long, but which was so alluring when it showed itself.

"That is a ripe age," we said, laughing, and then we bade her seat herself. At once we began to pour forth that long and dull and ugly lesson which is so common to our life, in which we tried to explain to our unwilling pupil that of all respectable professions for young women literature is the most uncertain, the most heart-breaking, and the most dangerous. "You hear of the few who are remunerated," we said; "but you hear nothing of the thousands that fail."

"It is so noble!" she replied.

"But so hopeless."

"There are those who succeed."

"Yes, indeed. Even in a lottery one must gain the prize; but they who trust to lotteries break their hearts."

"But literature is not a lottery. If I am fit, I shall succeed. Mr. — thinks I may succeed." Many more words of wisdom we spoke to her, and well do we remember her reply when we had run all our line off the reel, and had completed our sermon. "I shall go on all the same," she said. "I shall try, and try again, — and again."

Her power over us, to a certain extent, was soon established. Of course we promised to read the MS., and turned it over, no doubt with an anxious countenance, to see of what nature was the writing. There is a feminine scrawl of a nature so terrible that the task of reading becomes worse than the treadmill. "I know I can write well, — though I am not quite sure about the spelling," said Mary, as she observed the glance of our eyes. She spoke truly. The writing was good, though the erasures and alterations were very numerous. And then the story was intended to fill only one volume. "I will copy it for you if you wish it," said Mary. "Though there are so many scratchings out, it has been copied once." We would not for worlds have given her such labor, and then we promised to read the tale. We forget how it was brought about, but she told us at that interview that her mother had obtained leave from the pastry-cook round the corner to sit there waiting till Mary should rejoin her. "I thought it would be trouble enough for you to have one of us here," she said, with her little laugh when I asked her why she had not brought her mother on with her. I own that I felt that she had been wise; and when I told her that if she would call on me again that day week I would then have read at any rate so much of her work as would enable me to give her my opinion, I did not invite her to bring her mother with her. I knew that I could talk more freely to the girl without the mother's presence. Even when you are past fifty, and intend only to preach a sermon, you do not wish to have a mother present.

When she was gone we took up the roll of paper and examined it. We looked at the division into chapters, at the various mottoes the poor child had chosen, pronounced to ourselves the name of the story, — it was simply the name of the heroine, an easy-going, unaffected, well-chosen name, — and read the last page of it. On such occasions the reader of the work begins his task almost with a conviction that the labor which he is about to undertake will be utterly thrown away. He feels all but sure that the matter will be bad, that it will be better for all parties, writer, intended readers, and intended publisher, that the written words should not be conveyed into type, — that it will be his duty after some fashion to convey that unwelcome opinion to the writer, and that the writer will go away incredulous, and accusing mentally the Mentor of the moment of all manner of literary sins, among which ignorance, jealousy, and falsehood will, in the poor author's imagination, be most prominent. And yet when the writer was asking for that opinion, declaring his especial desire that the opinion should be candid, protesting that his present wish is to have some gauge of his own capability, and that he has come to you believing you to be above others able to give him that gauge, — while his petition to you was being made, he was in every respect sincere. He had come desirous to measure himself, and had believed that you could measure him. When coming he did not think that you would declare him to be an Apollo. He had told himself, no doubt, how probable it was that you would point out to him that he was a dwarf. You find him to be an ordinary man, measuring perhaps five feet seven, and unable to reach the standard of the particular regiment in which he is ambitious of serving. You tell him so in what civillest words you know, and you are at once convicted in his mind of jealousy, ignorance, and falsehood! And yet he is perhaps a most excellent fellow, — and capable of performing the best of service, only in some other regiment! As we looked at Miss Gresley's manuscript, tumbling it through our hands, we expected even from her some such result. She had gained two things from us already by her outward and inward gifts, such as they were, — first that we would read her story, and secondly that we would read it quickly; but she had not as yet gained from us any belief that by reading it we could serve it.

We did read it, — the most of it before we left our editorial chair on that afternoon, so that we lost altogether the daily walk so essential to our editorial health, and were put to the expense of a cab on our return home. And we incurred some minimum of domestic discomfort from the fact that we did not reach our own door till twenty minutes after our appointed dinner hour. "I have this moment come from the office as hard as a cab could bring me," we said in answer to the mildest of reproaches, explaining nothing as to the nature of the cause which had kept us so long at our work.

We must not allow our readers to suppose that the intensity of our application had arisen from the overwhelming interest of the story. It was not that the story entranced us, but that our feeling for the writer grew as we read the story. It was simple, unaffected, and almost painfully unsensational. It contained, as I came to perceive afterwards, little more than a recital of what her imagination told her might too probably be the result of her own engagement. It was the story of two young people who become engaged and cannot be married. After a course of years the man, with many true arguments, asks to be absolved. The woman yields with an expressed conviction that her lover is right, settles herself down for maiden life, then breaks her heart and dies. The character of the man was utterly untrue to Nature. That of the woman was true, but commonplace. Other interest, or other character there was none. The dialogues between the lovers were many and tedious, and hardly a word was spoken between them which two lovers really would have uttered. It was clearly not a work as to which I could tell my little friend that she might depend upon it for fame or fortune. When I had finished it I was obliged to tell myself that I could not advise her even to publish it. But yet I could not say that she had mistaken her own powers or applied herself to a profession beyond her reach. There was a grace and delicacy in her work which were charming. Occasionally she escaped from the trammels of grammar, but only so far that it would be a pleasure to point out to her her errors. There was not a word that a young lady should not have written; and there were throughout the whole evident signs of honest work. We had six days to think it over between our completion of the task and her second visit.

She came exactly at the hour appointed, and seated herself at once in the arm-chair before us as soon as the young man had closed the door behind him. There had been no great occasion for nervousness at her first visit, and she had then, by an evident effort, overcome the diffidence incidental to a meeting with a stranger. But now she did not attempt to conceal her anxiety. "Well," she said, leaning forward, and looking up into our face, with her two hands folded together.

Even though Truth, standing full panoplied at our elbow, had positively demanded it, we could not have told her then to mend her stockings and bake her pies and desert the calling that she had chosen. She was simply irresistible, and would, we fear, have constrained us into falsehood had the question been between falsehood and absolute reprobation of her work. To have spoken hard, heart-breaking words to her, would have been like striking a child when it comes to kiss you. We fear that we were not absolutely true at first, and that by that absence of truth we made subsequent pain more painful. "Well," she said, looking up into our face. "Have you read it?" We told her that we had read every word of it. "And it is no good?"

We fear that we began by telling her that it certainly was good, — after a fashion, very good, — considering her youth and necessary inexperience, very good indeed. As we said this she shook her head, and sent out a spark or two from her eyes, intimating her conviction that excuses or quasi praise founded on her youth would avail her nothing. "Would anybody buy it from me?" she asked. No, we did not think that any publisher would pay her money for it. "Would they print it for me without costing me anything?" Then we told her the truth as nearly as we could. She lacked experience; and if, as she had declared to us before, she was determined to persevere, she must try again, and must learn more of that lesson of the world's ways which was so necessary to those who attempted to teach that lesson to others. "But I shall try again at once," she said. We shook our head, endeavoring to shake it kindly. "Curren Bell was only a young girl when she succeeded," she added. The injury which Curren Bell did after this fashion was almost equal to that perpetrated by Jack Sheppard.

She remained with us then for above an hour, — for more than two probably, though the time was not specially marked by us; and before her visit was brought to a close she had told us of her engagement with the curate. Indeed, we believe that the greater part of her little history as hitherto narrated was made known to us on that occasion. We asked after her mother early in the interview, and learned that she was not on this occasion kept waiting at the pastry-cook's shop. Mary had come alone, making use of some friendly omnibus, of which she had learned the route. When she told us that she and her mother had come up to London solely with the view of forwarding her views in her intended profession, we ventured to ask whether it would not be wiser for them to return to Cornboro, seeing how improbable it was that she would have matter fit for the press within any short period. Then she explained that they had calculated that they would be able to live in London for twelve months, if they spent nothing except on absolute necessities. The poor girl seemed to keep back nothing from us. "We have clothes that will carry us through, and we shall be very careful. I came in an omnibus; but I shall walk if you will let me come again." Then she asked me for advice. How was she to set about further work with the best chance of turning it to account?

It had been altogether the fault of that retired literary gentleman down in the North, who had obtained what standing he had in the world of letters by writing about guano and the cattle plague. Divested of all responsibility, and fearing no further trouble to himself, he had ventured to tell this girl that her work was full of promise. Promise means probability, and in this case there was nothing beyond a most remote chance. That she and her mother should have left their little household gods, and come up to London on such a chance, was a thing terrible to the mind. But we felt before these two hours were over that we could not throw her off now. We had become old friends, and there had been that between us which gave her a positive claim upon our time. She had sat in our arm-chair, leaning forward with her elbows on her knees and her hands stretched out, till we, caught by the charm of her unstudied intimacy, had wheeled round our chair, and had placed ourselves, as nearly as the circumstances would admit, in the same position. The magnetism had already begun to act upon us. We soon found ourselves taking it for granted that she was to remain in London and begin another book. It was impossible to resist her. Before the interview was over, we, who had been conversant with all these matters before she was born; we, who had latterly come to regard our own editorial fault as being chiefly that of personal harshness; we, who had repulsed aspirant novelists by the score, — we had consented to be a party to the creation, if not to the actual writing, of this new book!

It was to be done after this fashion. She was to fabricate a plot, and to bring it to us, written on two sides of a sheet of letter paper. On the reverse sides we were to criticise this plot, and prepare emendations. Then she was to make out skeletons of the men and women who were afterwards to be clothed with flesh and made alive with blood, and covered with cuticles. After that she was to arrange her proportions; and at last, before she began to write the story, she was to describe in detail such part of it as was to be told in each chapter. On every advancing wavelet of the work we were to give her our written remarks. All this we promised to do because of the quiver in her lip, and the alternate tear and sparkle in her eye. "Now that I have found a friend, I feel sure that I can do it," she said, as she held our hand tightly before she left us.

In about a month, during which she had twice written to us, and twice been answered, she came with her plot. It was the old story, with some additions and some change. There was matrimony instead of death at the end, and an old aunt was brought in for the purpose of relenting and producing an income. We added a few details, feeling as we did so that we were the very worst of bochers. We doubt now whether the old, sad, simple story was not the better of the two. Then, after another lengthened interview, we sent our pupil back to create her skeletons. When she came with the skeletons we were dear friends, and we had learned to call her Mary. Then it was that she first sat at our editorial table, and wrote a love-letter to the curate. It was then mid-winter, wanting but a few days to Christmas, and Arthur, as she called him, did not like the cold weather. "He does not say so," she said, "but I fear he is ill. Don't you think there are some people with whom everything is unfortunate?" She wrote her letter, and had recovered her spirits before she took her leave.

We then proposed to her to bring her mother to dine with us on Christmas Day. We had made a clean breast of it at home in regard to our heart-flutterings, and had been met with a suggestion that some kindness might with propriety be shown to the old lady as well as to the young one. We had felt grateful to the old lady for not coming to our office with her daughter, and had at once assented. When we made the suggestion to Mary there came first a blush over all her face, and then there followed the well-known smile before the blush was gone. "You'll all be dressed fine," she said. We protested that not a garment would be changed by any of the family after the decent church-going in the morning. "Just as I am?" she asked. "Just as you are," we said, looking at the dear gray frock, adding some mocking assertion that no possible combination of millinery could improve her. "And mamma will be just the same? Then we will come," she said. We told her an absolute falsehood, as to some necessity which would take us in a cab to Euston Square on the afternoon of that Christmas Day, so that we could call and bring them both to our house without trouble or expense. "You sha'n't do anything of the kind," she said. However we swore to our falsehood, — perceiving, as we did so, that she did not believe a word of it; but in the matter of the cab we had our own way.

We found the mother to be what we had expected, — a weak, ladylike, lachrymose old lady, endowed with a profound admiration for her daughter, and so bashful that she could not at all enjoy her plum-pudding. We think that Mary did enjoy hers thoroughly. She made a little speech to the mistress of the house, praising ourselves with warm words and tearful eyes, and immediately won the heart of a new friend. She allied herself warmly to our daughters, put up with the school-boy pleasantries of our sons, and before the evening was over was dressed up as a ghost for the amusement of some neighboring children who were brought in to play snapdragon. Mrs. Gresley, as she drank her tea and crumbled her bit of cake, seated on a distant sofa, was not so happy, partly because she remembered her old gown, and partly because our wife was a stranger to her. Mary had forgotten both circumstances before the dinner was half over. She was the sweetest ghost that ever was seen. How pleasant would be our ideas of departed spirits if such ghosts would visit us frequently!

They repeated their visits to us not unfrequently during the twelve months; but as the whole interest attaching to our intercourse had reference to circumstances which took place in that editorial room of ours, it will not be necessary to refer further to the hours, very pleasant to ourselves, which she spent with us in our domestic life. She was ever made welcome when she came, and was known by us as a dear, well-bred, modest, clever little girl. The novel went on. That catalogue of the skeletons gave us more trouble than all the rest, and many were the tears which she shed over it, and sad were the misgivings by which she was afflicted, though never vanquished! How was it to be expected that a girl of eighteen should portray characters such as she had never known? In her intercourse with the curate all the intellect had been on her side. She had loved him because it was requisite to her to love some one; and now, as she had loved him, she was as true as steel to him. But there had been almost nothing for her to learn from him. The plan of the novel went on, and as it did so we became more and more despondent as to its success. And through it all we knew how contrary it was to our own judgment to expect, even to dream of, anything but failure. Though we went on working with her, finding it to be quite impossible to resist her entreaties, we did tell her from day to day that, even presuming she were entitled to hope for ultimate success, she must go through an apprenticeship of ten years before she could reach it. Then she would sit silent, repressing her tears, and searching for arguments with which to support her cause.

"Working hard is apprenticeship," she said to us once.

"Yes, Mary; but the work will be more useful, and the apprenticeship more wholesome, if you will take them for what they are worth."

"I shall be dead in ten years," she said.

"If you thought so you would not intend to marry Mr. Donne. But even, were it certain that such would be your fate, how can that alter the state of things? The world will know nothing of that; and if it did, would the world buy your book out of pity?"

"I want nobody to pity me," she said; "but I want you to help me." So we went on helping her. At the end of four months she had not put pen to paper on the absolute body of her projected novel; and yet she had worked daily at it, arranging its future construction.

During the next month, when we were in the middle of March, a gleam of real success came to her. We had told her frankly that we would publish nothing of hers in the periodical which we were ourselves conducting. She had become too dear to us for us not to feel that were we to do so, we should be doing it rather for her sake than for that of our readers. But we did procure for her the publication of two short stories elsewhere. For these she received twelve guineas, and it seemed to her that she had found an El Dorado of literary wealth. I shall never forget her ecstasy when she knew that her work would be printed, or her renewed triumph when the first humble check was given into her hands. There are those who will think that such a triumph, 'as connected with literature, must be sordid. For ourselves, we are ready to acknowledge that money payment for work done is the best and most honest test of success. We are sure that it is so felt by young barristers and young doctors, and we do not see why rejoicing on such realization of long-cherished hope should be more vile with the literary aspirant than with them. "What do you think I'll do first with it?" she said. We thought she meant to send something to her lover, and we told her so. "I'll buy mamma a bonnet to go to church in. I did n't tell you before, but she has n't been these three Sundays because she has n't one fit to be seen." I changed the check for her, and she went off and bought the bonnet.

Though I was successful for her in regard to the two stories, I could not go beyond that. We could have filled pages of periodicals with her writing had we been willing that she should work without remuneration. She herself was anxious for such work, thinking that it would lead to something better. But we opposed it, and, indeed, would not permit it, believing that work so done can be serviceable to none but those who accept it that pages may be filled without cost.

During the whole winter, while she was thus working, she was in a state of alarm about her lover. Her hope was ever that when warm weather came he would again be well and strong. We know nothing sadder than such hope founded on such source. For does not the winter follow the summer, and then again comes the killing spring? At this time she used to read us passages from his letters, in which he seemed to speak of little but his own health. In her literary ambition he never seemed to have taken part since she had declared her intention of writing profane novels. As regarded him, his sole merit to us seemed to be in his truth to her. He told her that in his opinion they two were as much joined together as though the service of the Church had bound them; but even in saying that he spoke ever of himself and not of her. Well, — May came, dangerous, doubtful, deceitful May, and he was worse. Then, for the first time, the dread word, Consumption, passed her lips. It had already passed ours mentally a score of times. We asked her what she herself would wish to do. Would she desire to go down to Dorsetshire and see him? She thought awhile, and said that she would wait a little longer.

The novel went on, and at length, in June, she was writing the actual words on which, as she thought, so much depended. She had really brought the story into some shape in the arrangement of her chapters; and sometimes even I began to hope. There were moments in which with her hope was almost certainty. Towards the end of June Mr. Donne declared himself to be better. He was to have a holiday in August, and then he intended to run up to London and see his betrothed. He still gave details, which were distressing to us, of his own symptoms; but it was manifest that he himself was not desponding, and she was governed in her trust or in her despair altogether by him. But when August came the period of his visit was postponed. The heat had made him weak, and he was to come in September.

Early in August we ourselves went away for our annual recreation, — not that we shoot grouse, or that we have any strong opinion that August and September are the best months in the year for holiday making, — but that everybody does go in August. We ourselves are not specially fond of August. In many places to which one goes a touring mosquitos bite in that month. The heat, too, prevents one from walking. The inns are all full, and the railways crowded. April and May are twice pleasanter months in which to see the world and the country. But fashion is everything, and no man or woman will stay in town in August for whom there exists any practicability of leaving it. We went on the 10th, — just as though we had a moor, and one of the last things we did before our departure was to read and revise the last written chapter of Mary's story.

About the end of September we returned, and up to that time the lover had not come to London. Immediately on our return we wrote to Mary, and the next morning she was with us. She had seated herself on her usual chair before she spoke, and we had taken her hand and asked after herself and her mother. Then, with something of mirth in our tone, we demanded the work which she had done since our departure. "He is dying," she replied.

She did not weep as she spoke. It was not on such occasions as this that the tears filled her eyes. But there was in her face a look of fixed and settled misery, which convinced us that she at least did not doubt the truth of her own assertion. We muttered something as to our hope that she was mistaken. "The doctor there has written to tell mamma that it is so. Here is his letter." The doctor's letter was a good letter, written with more of assurance than doctors can generally allow themselves to express. "I fear that I am justified in telling you," said the doctor, "that it can only be a question of weeks." We got up and took her hand. There was not a word to be uttered.

"I must go to him," she said after a pause.

"Well, — yes. It will be better."

"But we have no money." It must be explained now that offers of slight, very slight, pecuniary aid had been made by us both to Mary and her mother on more than one occasion. These had been refused with adamant firmness, but always with something of mirth, or at least of humor, attached to the refusal. The mother would simply refer to the daughter, and Mary would declare that they could manage to see the twelvemonth through and go back to Cornboro, without becoming absolute beggars. She would allude to their joint wardrobe, and would confess that there would not have been a pair of boots between them but for that twelve guineas; and indeed she seemed to have stretched that modest income so as to cover a legion of purchases. And of these things she was never ashamed to speak. We think there must have been at least two gray frocks, because the frocks were always clean, and never absolutely shabby. Our girls at home declared that they had seen three. Of her frock, as it happened, she never spoke to us, but the new boots and the new gloves, "and ever so many things that I can't tell you about, which we really could n't have gone without," all came out of the twelve guineas. That she had taken, not only with delight, but with triumph. But pecuniary assistance from ourselves she had always refused. "It would be a gift," she would say.

"Have it as you like."

"But people don't give other people money."

"Don't they? That's all you know about the world."

"Yes, to beggars. We hope we need n't come to that." It was thus that she always answered us, — but always with something of laughter in her eye, as though their poverty was a joke. Now, when the demand upon her was for that which did not concern her personal comfort, which referred to a matter felt by her to be vitally important, she declared, without a minute's hesitation, that she had not money for the journey.

"Of course you can have money," we said. "I suppose you will go at once?"

"O yes, — at once; that is, in a day or two, — after he shall have received my letter. Why should I wait?" We sat down to write a check, and she, seeing what we were doing, asked how much it was to be. "No, — half that will do," she said. "Mamma will not go. We have talked it over and decided it. Yes, I know all about that. I am going to see my lover, — my dying lover; and I have to beg for the money to take me to him. Of course I am a young girl; but in such a condition am I to stand upon the ceremony of being taken care of? A housemaid would n't want to be taken care of at eighteen." We did exactly as she bade us, and then attempted to comfort her while the young man went to get money for the check. What consolation was possible? It was simply necessary to admit with frankness that sorrow had come from which there could be no present release. "Yes," she said. "Time will cure it, — in a way. One dies in time, and then of course it is all cured." "One hears of this kind of thing often," she said afterwards, still leaning forward in her chair, still with something of the old expression in her eyes, — something almost of humor in spite of her grief; "but it is the girl who dies. When it is the girl there is n't, after all, so much harm done. A man goes about the world and can shake it off; and then, there are plenty of girls." We could not tell her how infinitely more important, to our thinking, was her life than that of him whom she was going to see now for the last time; but there did spring up within our mind a feeling, greatly opposed to that conviction which formerly we had endeavored to impress upon herself, — that she was destined to make for herself a successful career.

She went, and remained by her lover's bedside for three weeks. She wrote constantly to her mother, and once or twice to ourselves. She never again allowed herself to entertain a gleam of hope, and she spoke of her sorrow as a thing accomplished. In her last interview with us she had hardly alluded to her novel, and in her letters she never mentioned it. But she did say one word which made us guess what was coming. "You will find me greatly changed in one thing," she said; "so much changed that I need never have troubled you." The day of her return to London was twice postponed, but at last she was brought to leave him. Stern necessity was too strong for her. Let her pinch herself as she might, she must live down in Dorsetshire, — and could not live on his means, which were as narrow as her own. She left him; and on the day after her arrival in London she walked across from Euston Square to our office.

"Yes," she said, "it is all over. I shall never see him again on this side of heaven's gates." I do not know that we ever saw a tear in her eyes produced by her own sorrow. She was possessed of some wonderful strength which seemed to suffice for the bearing of any burden. Then she paused, and we could only sit silent, with our eyes fixed upon the rug. "I have made him a promise," she said at last. Of course we asked her what was the promise, though at the moment we thought that we knew. "I will make no more attempt at novel-writing."

"Such a promise should not have been asked, — or given," we said, vehemently.

"It should have been asked, — because he thought it right," she answered. "And of course it was given. Must he not know better than I do? Is he not one of God's ordained priests? In all the world is there one so bound to obey him as I?" There was nothing to be said for it at such a moment as that. There is no enthusiasm equal to that produced by a death-bed parting. "I grieve greatly," she said, "that you should have had so much vain labor with a poor girl who can never profit by it."

"I don't believe the labor will have been vain," we answered, having altogether changed those views of ours as to the futility of the pursuit which she had adopted.

"I have destroyed it all," she said.

"What! burned the novel?"

"Every scrap of it. I told him that I would do so, and that he should know that I had done it. Every page was burned after I got home last night, and then I wrote to him before I went to bed."

"Do you mean that you think it wicked that people should write novels?" we asked.

"He thinks it to be a misapplication of God's gifts, and that has been enough for me. He shall judge for me, but I will not judge for others. And what does it matter? I do not want to write a novel now."

They remained in London till the end of the year for which the married curate had taken their house, and then they returned to Cornboro. We saw them frequently while they were still in town, and despatched them by the train to the north just when the winter was beginning. At that time the young clergyman was still living down in Dorsetshire, but he was lying in his grave when Christmas came. Mary never saw him again, nor did she attend his funeral. She wrote to us frequently then, as she did for years afterwards. "I should have liked to have stood at his grave," she said; "but it was a luxury of sorrow that I wished to enjoy, and they who cannot earn luxuries should not have them. They were going to manage it for me here, but I knew I was right to refuse it." Right, indeed! As far as we knew her, she never moved a single point from what was right.

All these things happened many years ago. Mary Gresley, on her return to Cornboro, apprenticed herself, as it were, to the married curate there, and called herself, I think, a female Scripture reader. I know that she spent her days in working hard for the religious aid of the poor around her. From time to time we endeavored to instigate her to literary work; and she answered our letters by sending us wonderful little dialogues between Tom the Saint and Bob the Sinner. We are in no humor to criticise them now; but we can assert, that though that mode of religious teaching is most distasteful to us, the literary merit shown even in such works as these was very manifest. And there came to be apparent in them a gleam of humor which would sometimes make us think that she was sitting opposite to us and looking at us, and that she was Tom the Saint, and that we were Bob the Sinner. We said what we could to turn her from her chosen path, throwing into our letters all the eloquence and all the thought of which we were masters; but our eloquence and our thought were equally in vain.

At last, when eight years had passed over her head after the death of Mr. Donne, she married a missionary who was going out to some forlorn country on the confines of African colonization; and there she died. We saw her on board the ship in which she sailed, and before we parted there had come that tear into her eyes, the old look of supplication on her lips, and the gleam of mirth across her face. We kissed her once, — for the first and only time, — as we bade God bless her!

ST. PAUL AND PROTESTANTISM.

BY MATTHEW ARNOLD.

II. (Concluded.)

THAT Paul, as we have said, accepted the physical miracle of Christ's resurrection and ascension as a part of the signs and wonders which accompanied Christianity, there can be no doubt. Just in the same manner he accepted the eschatology, as it is called, of his nation, — their doctrine of the final things and of the summons by a trumpet in the sky to judgment; he accepted Satan, hierarchies of angels, and an approaching end of the world. What we deny is, that his acceptance of the former gives his teaching its essential characters, any more than his acceptance of the latter. We should but be continuing, with strict logical development, Paul's essential line of thought, if we said that the true ascension and glorified reign of Christ was the triumph and reign of his spirit, his real life, far more operative after his death on the cross than before it; and that in this sense most truly he and all who persevere to the end as he did are "sown in weakness but raised in power." Paul himself, however, did not distinctly continue his thoughts thus, and neither will we do so for him. How far Paul himself knew that he had gone in his irresistible bent to find, for each of the data of his religion, that side of moral and spiritual significance which, as a mere sign and wonder, it had not and could not have; — what data he himself was conscious of having transferred, through following this bent, from the first rank in importance to the second; — we cannot know with any certainty.

That the bent existed, that Paul felt it existed, and that it establishes a wide difference between the earliest epistles and the latest, is beyond question. Already, in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, he declares that, "though he had henceforth known Christ after the flesh, yet henceforth he knew him so no more"; and in the Epistle to the Romans, accordingly, he rejects the notion of dwelling on the miraculous Christ, of the descent into hell, and of the ascent into heaven, and fixes the believer's attention solely on the spirit of Christ and on the effects produced by an acquaintance with it. In the same epistle, in like manner, the kingdom of God, of which to the Thessalonians he described the advent in such materializing and popularly Judaic language, has become "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit."

These ideas, we repeat, may never have excluded others, which absorbed the most part of Paul's contemporaries as they absorb popular religion at this day. To popular religion, the real kingdom of God is the New Jerusalem with its jaspers and emeralds; righteousness and peace and joy are only the kingdom of God figuratively. The real sitting in heavenly places is the sitting on throne in a land of pure delight after we are dead; serving the Spirit of God is only sitting in heavenly places figuratively. Science exactly reverses this process; for science, the spiritual notion is the real one, the material notion is figurative. The astonishing greatness of Paul is that, coming when and where and whence he did, he yet grasped the spiritual notion, if not exclusively and fully, yet firmly and predominantly; more and more predominantly through all the last years of his life. And what makes him original and himself, is not what he shares with his contemporaries and with modern popular religion, but this which he develops of his own; and this which he develops of his own is just of a nature to make his religion a theology instead of a theurgy, and at bottom a scientific instead of a non-scientific structure. "Die and re-exist!" says Goethe, — an unsuspected witness, certainly, to the psychological and scientific profoundness of Paul's conception of life and death: "Die and re-exist! for so long as this is not accomplished, thou art but a troubled guest upon an earth of gloom."*

The three cardinal points in Paul's theology are not, therefore, we repeat, those commonly assigned by Puritanism, calling, justification, sanctification; they are these: dying with Christ, resurrection from the dead, growing into Christ. And we will venture, moreover, to affirm that the more the Epistle to the Romans is read and reread with a clear mind, the more will the conviction strengthen, that the sense indicated by the order in which we here class the second main term of Paul's conception is the essential sense which Paul himself attaches to this term, in every single place where in that epistle he has used it. Not tradition and not theory, but a simple impartial study of the development of Paul's central line of thought, brings us to the conclusion, that from the very outset of the epistle, where Paul speaks of Christ as "declared to be the Son of God with power according to the spirit of holiness by resurrection from the dead," to the very end, the essential sense in which Paul uses the term resurrection is that of a rising, in this visible earthly existence; from the death of obedience to blind, selfish impulse, to the life of obedience to the eternal moral order; — in Christ's case first, as the pattern for us to follow; in the believer's case afterwards, as following Christ's pattern through identifying himself with him.

We have thus reached Paul's fundamental conception without even a glimpse of the fundamental conceptions of Puritanism, which, nevertheless, professes to have learnt its doctrine from St. Paul and from his Epistle to the Romans. Once, for a moment, the term faith brought us in contact with the doctrine of Puritanism, but only to see that the essential sense given to this word by Paul, Puritanism had missed entirely. Other parts, then, of the Epistle to the Romans than those by which we have been occupied must have chiefly fixed the attention of Puritanism. And so it has in truth been. Yet the parts of the Epistle to the Romans that have occupied us are undoubtedly the parts which not our own theories and inclinations, for we have approached the matter without any, but an impartial criticism of Paul's real line of thought must elevate as the most important. If a somewhat pedantic form of expression may be forgiven for the sake of clearness, we may say that of the eleven first chapters of the Epistle to the Romans, — the chapters which convey Paul's theology, though not, as we have seen, with any scholastic purpose or in any formal scientific mode of exposition, — of these eleven chapters, the first, second, and third are, in a scale of importance fixed by a scientific criticism of Paul's line of thought, sub-primary; the fourth and fifth are secondary; the sixth and eighth are primary; the seventh chapter is sub-primary; the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters are secondary. Furthermore, to the contents of the separate chapters themselves this scale must be carried on, so far as to mark that of the two great primary chapters, — the sixth and the eighth; the eighth is primary down only to the end of the twenty-eighth verse; from thence to the end it is, however eloquent, yet for the purpose of a scientific criticism of Paul's essential theology, only secondary. The first chapter is to the Gentiles; — its purport is: You have not righteousness. The second is to the Jews; — its purport is: No more have you, though you think you have. The third chapter announces faith in Christ as the one source of righteousness for all men. The fourth chapter gives to the notion of righteousness through faith the sanction of the Old Testament and of the history of Abraham. The fifth insists on the causes for thankfulness and exultation in the boon of righteousness through faith in Christ, and applies illustratively, with this design, the history of Adam. The sixth chapter comes to the all-important question, "What is that faith in Christ which I, Paul, mean?" and answers it. The seventh illustrates and explains the answer. But the eighth, down to the end of the twenty-eighth verse, develops and completes the answer. The rest of the eighth chapter expresses the sense of safety and gratitude which the solution is fitted to inspire. The ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters uphold the second chapter's thesis, — so hard to a Jew, so easy to us, — that righteousness is not by the Jewish law; but dwell with hope and joy on a final result of things which is to be favorable to Israel.

Bist du nur ein trüber Gast

We shall be pardoned this somewhat formal analysis in consideration of the clearness with which it enables us to survey the Puritan scheme of original sin, predestination, and justification. The historical transgression of Adam occupies, it will be observed, in Paul's ideas, by no means the primary, fundamental, all-important place which it holds in the ideas of Puritanism. "This is our original sin, the bitter root of all our actual transgressions, in thought, word, and deed." Ah, no! Paul did not go to the Book of Genesis for his authentic information on this head. He went to experience for it. "I see," he says, "a law in my members fighting against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity." This is the essential testimony respecting the rise of sin to Paul, — this rise of it in his own heart and in the heart of all the men who hear him. At quite a later stage in his conception of the religious life, in quite a subordinate capacity, and for the mere purpose of illustration, comes in the allusion to Adam and to what is called original sin. Paul's desire for righteousness has carried him to Christ and to the conception of the righteousness which is of God by faith, and he is expressing his gratitude, delight, wonder, at the boon he has discovered. For the purpose of exalting it he reverts to the well-known story of Adam. It cannot even be said that Paul Judaizes in his use here of this story; so entirely does he subordinate it to his purpose of illustration, using it just as he might have used it had he believed, which undoubtedly he did not, that it was merely a symbolical legend, though a very primitive and profound one, as well as perfectly familiar to himself and his hearers. "Think," he says, "how in Adam's fall one man's one transgression involved all men in a punishment; then estimate the blessedness of our boon in Christ, where one man's one righteousness involves a world of transgressors in blessing!" This is not a scientific doctrine of corruption inherited through Adam's fall; it is a rhetorical use of Adam's fall in a passing allusion to it.

We come to predestination. We have seen how Paul's consciousness of the power in which we live and move and have our being was twofold. He conceived this divine power, and with profound truth, as not only the fountain of morals and reason, but also as the fountain of life and affection. He thus rested on the thought of God as a creator, sustainer, father, as well as on the thought of him as a moral lawgiver and judge. "The Lord is righteous in all his ways." But not only so. Also, "The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works. He opens his hand, and satisfieth the desire of every living thing." The power and originality of Paul's theology consists in his making these two notions combine for a religious result. What man could not do by the warnings of God the judge, he does, in Paul's theology, by the inspiration of God the creator and father. What he could not do through the power of reason and duty, he does through the power of sympathy and emotion. This is grace, this is the free gift of God, who gives abundantly beyond all that we ask or think, and calls things that are not as though they were. The sense of life, peace, and joy, which comes through identification with Christ, brings with it a deep and grateful consciousness that this sense is none of our own getting and making. "It is not of him that willeth or of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy." As moral agents, for whom alone exist all the predicaments of merit and demerit, praise and blame, effort and failure, vice and virtue, we are impotent and lost; — we are saved through our affections, it is as sentient beings we are saved! Well might Paul cry out, as this mystical but profound and beneficent conception filled his soul: "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose." Well might he say, in the gratitude which cannot find words enough to express its sense of boundless favor, that those who reached peace with God through identification with Christ were vessels of mercy, marked from endless ages; that they had been foreknown, predestinated, called, justified, glorified.

It may be regretted, for the sake of the clear understanding of his essential doctrine, that Paul did not stop here. It might seem as if the word, "prothesis," purpose, lured him on into speculative mazes, and involved him, at last, in an embarrassment, from which he impatiently tore himself by the harsh, unedifying image of the clay and the potter. But this is not so. These allurements of speculation, which have been fatal to so many of his interpreters, never mastered Paul. He was led into difficulty by the tendency which we have already noticed as making his real imperfection both as a thinker and as a writer,—the tendency to Judaize. Already, in the fourth chapter, this tendency had led him to seem to rest his doctrine of justification by faith upon the case of Abraham, whereas in truth, it needs all the good-will in the world, and some effort of ingenuity, even to bring the case of Abraham within the operation of this doctrine. That righteousness is life, that all men by themselves fail of righteousness, that only through identification with Christ can they reach it,—these propositions, for us at any rate, prove themselves much better than they are proved by the thesis that Abraham in old age believed God's promise that his seed should yet be as the stars for multitude, and that this was counted to him for righteousness. The sanction thus apparently given to the idea that faith is a mere belief, or opinion of the mind, has put thousands of Paul's readers on a false track. But Paul's dealings with Abraham did not end here. To establish his doctrine of righteousness by faith, he had to eradicate the notion that the Jews were specially privileged, and that, having the Mosaic law, they did not need anything farther. For us, this one verse of the tenth chapter: There is no difference between Jew and Greek, for it is the same Lord of all, who is rich to all that call upon him,—and these four words of another verse: For righteousness, heart-faith necessary!—effect far more for Paul's object than his three chapters bristling with Old Testament quotations. By quotation, however, he was to proceed, in order to invest his doctrine with the talismanic virtues of a verbal sanction from the law and the prophets. He shows, therefore, that the law and the prophets had said that only a remnant, an elect remnant, of Israel should be saved, and that the rest should be blinded. But to say that peace with God through Christ inspires such an abounding sense of gratitude, and of its not being our work, that we can only speak of ourselves as called and chosen to it, is one thing; in so speaking, we are on the ground of personal experience. But to say that God has blinded and reprobated other men, so that they shall not reach this blessing, is to quit the ground of personal experience, and to begin employing the magnified and non-natural man in the next street. We then require, in order to account for his proceedings, such an analogy as that of the clay and the potter. This is Calvinism, and St. Paul undoubtedly falls into it. But the important thing to remark is, that this Calvinism, which with the Calvinist is primary, is with Paul secondary or even less than secondary. What with Calvinists is their fundamental idea, the centre of their theology, is for Paul an idea added to his central ideas, and extraneous to them; brought in incidentally, and due to the necessities of a bad mode of recommending and enforcing his thesis. It is as if Newton had introduced into his exposition of the law of gravitation an incidental statement, perhaps erroneous, about light or colors; and we were then to make this statement the head and front of Newton's law. The theological idea of reprobation was an idea of Jewish theology as of ours, an idea familiar to Paul and a part of his training, an idea which probably he never consciously abandoned. But its complete secondariness in him is clearly established by other considerations than those which we have drawn from the place and manner of his introduction of it. The very phrase about the clay and the potter is not Paul's own; he does but repeat a stock theological figur. Jeremiah had said, in the Lord's name, to Israel, "Behold, as the clay in the potter's hand, so are ye in mine hand, O house of Israel." And the son of Sirach comes yet nearer to Paul's very words: "As the clay is in the potter's hand to fashion it at his pleasure, so man is in the hand of him that made him, to render to them as liketh him best." Is an original man's essential, characteristic idea, that which he adopts thus bodily from some one else? But take Paul's truly essential idea. "We are buried with Christ through baptism into death, that like as he was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." Did Jeremiah say that? Is any one the author of it except Paul? Then there should Calvinism have looked for Paul's secret, and not in the commonplace about the potter and the vessels of wrath. A commonplace, which is so entirely a commonplace to him, that he contradicts it even while he is Judaizing; for in the very batch of chapters we are discussing he says: "Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." Still more clear is, on this point, his real mind, when he is not Judaizing: "God is the saviour of all men, specially of those that believe." And anything, finally, which might seem dangerous in the grateful sense of a calling, choosing, and leading by eternal goodness,—a notion as natural as the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination is monstrous,—Paul abundantly supplies in more than one striking passage; as, for instance, in that incomparable third chapter of the Philippians (from which, and from the sixth and eighth chapters of the Romans, Paul's whole theology, if all his other writings were lost, might be reconstructed), where he expresses his humble consciousness that the mystical resurrection which is his aim, glory, and salvation, he does not yet, and cannot, completely attain.

The grand doctrine, then, which Calvinistic Puritanism has gathered from Paul, turns out to be a secondary notion of his, which he himself, too, has contradicted or corrected. But, at any rate, "Christ meritoriously obtained eternal redemption for us." We rely entirely, as the quarterly organ of Puritanism has just told us in its hundredth number, on "the sacrificial Atonement of the Divine Son of God." God, his justice being satisfied by Christ's bearing according to compact our guilt and dying in our stead, is appeased and set free to exercise towards us his mercy, and to justify and sanctify us in consideration of Christ's righteousness imputed to us, if we give our hearty belief and consent to the satisfaction thus made. This hearty belief being given, "we rest," to use the consecrated expression already quoted, "in the finished work of a Saviour." This is now, as predestination formerly was, the favorite thesis of popular theology. And, like the doctrine of predestination, it professes to be specially derived from St. Paul.

But whoever has followed attentively the main line of St. Paul's theology, as we have tried to show it, will see at once that in St. Paul's essential ideas this popular notion of a substitution, a sacrifice, and an imputation of alien merit has no place. Paul knows nothing of a sacrificial atonement; what Paul knows of is a reconciling sacrifice. The real substitution, for Paul, is not the substitution of Christ in men's stead as victim on the cross to God's offended justice; it is the substitution by which the believer, in his own person, repeats Christ's dying to sin. Paul says, in real truth, to our Puritans with their magical and mechanical salvation, just what he said to the men of circumcision: "If I preach, resting in the finished work of a Saviour, why am I yet persecuted? why do I die daily? then is the stumbling-block of the cross annulled. That hard, that wellnigh impossible doctrine that our whole course must be a crucifixion and a resurrection, even as Christ's whole course was a crucifixion and a resurrection, becomes superfluous. Yet this is my central doctrine."

The notion of God, as a magnified and non-natural man, appeased by a sacrifice, and remitting, in consideration of it, his wrath against those who had offended him,—this notion of God, which science repels, was equally repelled, in spite of all that his nation, time, and training had in them to favor it, by the profound religious sense of Paul. In none of his epistles is the reconciling work of Christ really presented under this aspect. One great epistle there is which does present it under this aspect,—the Epistle to the Hebrews. If other proof were wanting, this alone would make it impossible that the Epistle to the Hebrews should be Paul's; and indeed of all the epistles which bear his name, it is the only one which may not, in spite of the hesitation caused by some difficulties, be finally attributed to him. The Epistle to the Hebrews is full of beauty and power; and what may be called the exterior conduct of its argument is as able and satisfying as Paul's exterior conduct of his argument is generally embarrassed. Its details are full of what is edifying; but its central conception of Christ's death, as a perfect sacrifice which consummated the imperfect sacrifices of the Jewish law, is a mere notion of the understanding, and is not a religious idea. The tradition which ascribes to Apollos the Epistle to the Hebrews derives corroboration from the one account of him which we have; that "he was an eloquent man and mighty in the Scriptures." The Epistle to the Hebrews is just such a performance as might naturally have come from an eloquent man and mighty in the Scriptures, and in whom the intelligence and the powers of combining, type-establishing, and expounding, somewhat dominated the religious perceptions. Turn it which way you will, the notion of vicarious sacrifice, which the Epistle to the Hebrews delivers, will never truly speak to the religious sense, or bear fruit for true religion. It is no blame to Apollos if he was led astray by this notion of vicarious sacrifice, for the whole world was full of it, up to his time, in his time, and since his time; and it has driven theologians before it like sheep. The wonder is, not that Apollos should have adopted it, but that Paul should have been enabled, through the incomparable power and energy of religious perception informing his intellectual perception, steadily to put it aside. Figures drawn from this dominant notion he used, for it has so saturated the imagination and language of humanity that its figures pass naturally and irresistibly into all our speech; popular Puritanism consists of the notion from the Epistle to the Hebrews set forth with Paul's figures. But the notion itself Paul had put aside, and had substituted for it a better.

The term sacrifice contains three notions: the notion of winning the favor or buying off the wrath of a powerful being by giving him something precious; the notion of parting with something precious; and the notion of expiation, not in the sense of buying off wrath or satisfying a claim, but of suffering in that wherein we have sinned. The first notion is, at bottom, merely superstitious, and belongs to the ignorant and fear-ridden childhood humanity; it is the main element, however, in the Puritan conception of justification. The second notion explains itself; it is the main element in the Pauline conception of justification. The third notion may easily be misdealt with; but it has a profound truth; something of it has no doubt made its way into the Puritan conception of justification, and inspires whatever in that conception is true and wholesome; in Paul's conception of justification there is much of it. Christ parted with what, to men in general, is the most precious of things,—individual self and selfishness; he pleased not himself, obeyed the Spirit of God, died to sin and to the law in our members, consummated upon the cross this death; that is Paul's essential notion of Christ's sacrifice. This proceeding "condemned sin in the flesh"; that notion, also, is very present along with the other to Paul's mind. Through the solidarity of men, eminent suffering, by an eminent person, becomes representative; therefore, in that death of Christ to selfish impulse which his crucifixion crowns and symbolizes, the race solemnly suffers wherein the race had sinned, and condemns that wherein it had sinned. This is the expiatory aspect of Christ's death for the imagination; its expiatory aspect from a moral point of view is that such a solemn and dolorous condemnation of sin does actually loosen sin's hold and attraction upon us who regard it,—makes it easier for us to die to sin.*

Christ's sacrifice, and the condemnation of sin it contained, was made for us while we were yet sinners; it was made irrespectively of our power or inclination to sympathize with it and appreciate it. Yet, even thus, the sacrifice reconciled us to God, to the eternal order; for it contained the means, the only possible means, of our being brought into harmony with this order. Christ, however, was delivered for our sins while we were yet sinners. But presently the influence of the pregnant act gains us. Then come the sympathy for the act and the appreciation of it, which its doer never regarded; faith in him enters into us, masters us. We identify ourselves with him; we repeat, through the power of this identification, his death to the law of the flesh and self-pleasing, his condemnation of sin in the flesh; the death how imperfectly, the condemnation how remorsefully! But we rise with him to life, the only true life, of imitation of God, of putting on the new man which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness, of following the eternal law of the moral order which by ourselves we could not follow. Then God justifies us; we have the righteousness of God and the sense of having it; we are freed from the oppressing sense of eternal order guiltily outraged and sternly retributive; we act in joyful conformity with God's will, instead of in miserable rebellion to it; we are in harmony with the universal order and feel that we are in harmony with it. If, then, Christ was delivered for our sins, he was raised for our justification. If by his death we were reconciled to God, by the means being thus provided for our else impossible access to God, much more, when we have availed ourselves of these means and died with him, are we saved by his life of which we partake. Henceforward we are not only justified but sanctified; not only in harmony with the eternal order and at peace with God, but consecrated* and unalterably devoted to them; and from this devotion comes an ever-growing union with God in Christ, an advance, as St. Paul says, from glory to glory.

This is Paul's conception of Christ's sacrifice. His figures of ransom, redemption, propitiation, blood, offering, all attach themselves to his central idea of identification with Christ through dying with him, and are strictly subservient to it. This language of Paul's has its own beauty and propriety; it is imaginative language; there is no need for turning it, as Puritanism has done, into the methodical language of the schools. But if it is to be turned into methodical language, then it is the language into which we have translated it that translates it truly.

We have seen how it fares with one of the two great tenets which Puritanism has extracted from St. Paul, — the tenet of predestination. We now see how it fares with the other, the tenet of justification. Paul's figures our Puritans have taken literally, while for his central idea they have substituted another, which is not his. And his central idea they have turned into a figure, and have let it almost disappear out of their mind. His essential idea lost, his figures misused, an idea essentially not his substituted for his, — the unifying patchwork thus made, Puritanism has stamped with Paul's name and called the gospel. It thunders at Romanism for not preaching it, it casts off Anglicanism for not setting it forth alone and unreservedly, it founds organizations of its own to give full effect to it; these organizations guide politics, govern statesmen, destroy institutions; — and they are based upon a blunder!

It is to Protestantism, and this its Puritan gospel, that the reproaches thrown on St. Paul, for shutting up religion of the heart into theories of the head about election and justification, rightly attach. St. Paul himself, as we have seen, begins with seeking righteousness and ends with finding it; from first to last, the practical religious sense never deserts him. If he could have seen and heard our preachers of predestination and justification, they are just the people he would have called "diseased about questions and word-battlings." He would have told Puritanism that every Sunday, when in all its countless chapels it reads him and preaches from him, the veil is upon its heart. The moment it reads him right, a veil will seem to be taken away from its heart, it will feel as though scales were fallen from its eyes.

But leaving Puritanism and its errors, let us turn again for a moment, before we end, to the glorious apostle who has occupied us so long. He died, and mankind's familiar fancies of appeasement and vicarious sacrifice, from which, by a prodigy of religious insight, Paul had been able to disengage the death of Christ, rushed over it and made it their own. Back rolled upon the human soul the mist which the fires of Paul's spiritual genius had dispersed for a few short years. The mind of the whole world was imbrued in the idea of blood, and only through the false idea of sacrifice did they reach Paul's true one. Paul's idea of dying with Christ the Imitation elevates more conspicuously than any Protestant treatise elevates it; but it elevates it environed and enfolded with the idea of appeasement, — of the magnified and non-natural man wrath-filled and blood-exacting, the human victim adding his peculiar sufferings to those of the divine. Meanwhile another danger was preparing. Gifted men had brought to the study of St. Paul the habits of the Greek and Roman schools, and philosophized where Paul Orientalized. Augustine, a great genius, — who can doubt it? — nay, a great religious genius, but unlike Paul in this, and inferior to him, that he confused the boundaries of metaphysics and religion,* which Paul never did, — Augustine set the example of finding in Paul's eastern speech, just as it stood, the formal propositions of western dialectics. Last came the interpreter in whose slowly relaxing grasp we still lie, — the heavy-handed Protestant Philistine. Sincere, gross of perception, prosaic, he saw in Paul's mystical idea of man's investiture with the righteousness of God nothing but a strict legal transaction, and reserved all his imagination for Hell and the New Jerusalem and his foretaste of them. A so-called Pauline scheme was in every one's mouth; but the ideas of the true Paul lay lost and buried.

Every one who has been at Rome has been taken to see the Church of St. Paul, rebuilt after a destruction by fire forty years ago. The church stands a mile or two out of the city, on the way to Ostia and the desert. The interior has all the costly magnificence of Italian churches; on the ceiling is written in gilded letters, "Doctor Gentium." Gold glitters and marbles gleam, but man and his movement are not there. The traveller has left at a distance the fumum et opes strepitumque Romæ; around him reigns solitude. There is Paul, with the mystery which was hid from ages and from generations, which was manifested by him for some half-score years, and which then was buried with him in his grave. Not in our day will he relive, with his incessant effort to spiritualize, with his incessant effort to make the intellect follow and secure the religious perception in all its workings. Of those who care for religion, the multitude of us want the materialism of the Apocalypse; the few want a vague religiosity. Science, which more and more teaches us to find in the unapparent the real, will gradually serve to conquer the materialism of popular religion. The friends of vague religiosity, on the other hand, will be more and more taught by experience that a theology, a scientific appreciation of the facts of religion,† is wanted for religion; but a theology which is a true theology, not a false. Both these influences will work for Paul's re-emergence. The doctrine of Paul will arise out of the tomb where for centuries it has lain covered; it will edify the Church of the future; it will have the consent of happier generations, the applause of less superstitious ages. All, all will be too little to pay half

* The endless words which Puritanism has wasted upon sanctification, a magical filling with goodness and holiness, flow from a mere mistake in translating; ἀγιασμός means consecration, a setting apart to holy service.

* Compare Paul's "blessed and only potentate, king of kings, and lord of lords, who only hath immortality, dwelling in light, unapproachable," with Augustine's "Deum sine quantitate magnam, sine qualitate bonum, sine tempore sempiternum, sine morte vitam, sine infirmitate fortem, sine mendacio verum, sine situ ubique præsentem, sine loco ubique totum," &c. The works of this great saint are encumbered with too many pages of such elaborate futilities.

the debt which the Church of God owes to this "least of the apostles, who was not fit to be called an apostle, because he persecuted the Church of God."

COLOSSAL FORTUNES.

WE have often thought that it would be very pleasant to possess a princely fortune. There is a pleasure, well understood by novelists, in simply calling up before our imagination vast sums of money and magnificent landed estates. We always like the last page, in which the various couples in whom we have taken an interest receive their portions with the boundless liberality of a good-natured writer of fiction. We admire the young lady in the model novel with five hundred thousand acres in a ring-fence in Norfolk, a county in Scotland, a castle in Wales, a villa at Richmond, a corner-house in Belgrave Square, and eighty thousand a year in the Three per Cents; and we feel a sympathetic thrill when Miriam de Mendoza takes a thousand-pound note from a bundle on the piano to light the extinguished chibouk of Lord Codringsby. If there is a pleasure in meeting with such gorgeous millionnaires even in fairy-land, how pleasant it must be to be ranked amongst their counterparts in real life! Of course the moralist has plenty of apothegms wherewith to damp our satisfaction. There are various little sayings about the blessings of mediocrity, the delight of making an honest living by the sweat of one's brow, and so on, which seem rather to savor of the remark about sour grapes. Could any of these severe gentlemen withstand the infinite charms of boundless wealth, if really within their reach? We admit, indeed, that there is probably a certain limitation even to the conveniences of money. We could be tolerably content, say, with a hundred thousand a year, and can imagine a doubt whether the addition of an equal sum to our annual income might not, after that point, begin to give more trouble than it was worth. After one had enough to satisfy every possible want, to give free play to all one's tastes in art, literature, or science, to have the most comfortable of houses, and the best of all possible eating and drinking, we might doubt whether an addition to our wealth might not bring more responsibility than amusement. We have heard it said that a man who resolves to spend all his income upon himself finds it very difficult, after he has passed a certain point, to find any new way of employing his fortune satisfactorily. Of course it is always open to a man to muddle away his money, in gambling or charity, to any conceivable extent; but there is practically a limit to the sum which can be spent directly upon one's self. What that limit may be it is, of course, very difficult to fix in practice; but there is no great temptation to be so rich that your wealth becomes a burden. Putting this question out of sight, and it is one that has little practical interest for most people, the natural expression of the feelings of the unregenerate man is that summed up so forcibly in Clough's ballad:—

"How pleasant it is to have money, heigho!
How pleasant it is to have money!"

And as much of it as possible.

Few, however, of the poorer classes will content themselves with this reflection on hearing of one of those vast fortunes whose existence is occasionally brought before us. We are, it may be, a little too jealous, or possibly a little too philosophical or too humane, to look upon them with that simple pleasure with which we contemplate a work of art, or with which ladies will gloat over the stores in a jeweller's shop-window. We are driven to reason about it, and to ask whether colossal fortunes are, or can be made, good things for the country in which they exist. Our reflections probably take the form of a simple argument for demonstrating the benefits of equality. It is plain that the sum of human happiness will be greater, if a hundred men have each a thousand a year, than if one man had a hundred thousand a year and the rest nothing. After the first few thousands, every additional thousand accumulated upon a single possession gives him less additional pleasure than its predecessors. To raise an income of twenty to one of twenty-one thousand a year gives very little extra gratification to its owner; he may keep another horse or two, and buy a few more pictures, but, all his chief wants being gratified, he can at most add a few comparatively insignificant luxuries to his stock. On the other hand, the addition of the same income to a man who was previously in the depths of poverty may lift him definitely to a higher level, and make his life one of comfort, instead of one of constant toil and vexation. The argument proves conclusively that, given a certain total of revenue in a country, it will produce more happiness when widely distributed than when divided into very unequal lumps. The ordinary complaint about the rich growing richer and the poor poorer seems generally to imply a tacit assumption of this kind. It is supposed that there is only a certain quantity of wealth in the country, and that, if one man gets a larger share, it must necessarily be made up from those of his poorer neighbors. If this were the real state of the case, it should be the greatest object of philanthropists to devise some means by which wealth might be made to flow uniformly over the whole surface of the country, instead of gathering in irregular masses, and being spread thinly in one quarter and thickly in another.

Without asking whether this is applicable to any particular cases, it is plain that it omits one essential element of the question. The assumption that the whole amount of wealth is a fixed quantity is the reverse of the truth. Nothing, moreover, can be plainer than that a rapid growth of wealth is favorable to the development of large fortunes, and that reciprocally the possession of large fortunes is in many ways favorable to a rapid growth of wealth. Some of the most striking phenomena in American society are due to the first of these truths. There was a time when the genuine democratic ideal was partially realized there, and when, as it is said, every man in Connecticut was rich enough to keep a one-horse chaise, and scarcely anybody rich enough to keep a chaise with two horses. That halcyon period has long gone by; and it is plain enough that, if American democracy levels everything else, it has at least no tendency to level fortunes. We seem to be approaching an epoch when such men as Vanderbilt and Drew will be the most prominent figures in the great Republic. The growth of such enormous commercial centres as New York and Chicago inevitably tends to centralization of wealth. A shrewd speculator who is at the centre towards which so many streams of fortune are constantly flowing has immense opportunities of growing rich, in Dr. Johnson's phrase, beyond the dreams of avarice. There is no probability that the tendency will be diminished. The difference between the democracies of the future and the old-fashioned aristocracies is not that there will be greater equality of wealth in the democracies, but that fortunes will be more mobile, and will not give rise to families permanently raised above their neighbors. We may look forward, in short, with far more confidence to a period of gigantic fortunes than to one in which everybody will be moderately comfortable. The dreams of socialists may be destined at some future time to take concrete shape; but so far as we can say from experience, the reverse of the process for which they pray is more likely to take place. Not only will great land-owners become rich by the simple process of sitting still and looking on at the development of the country, but even if landed estates should be summarily cut up and distributed equally amongst the population, some more radical change would be required to check the development of huge commercial fortunes. We shall have bankers, and manufacturers, and railway proprietors, whose wealth would seem to us to be fabulous, even if the most stringent legislation should enforce the minute partition of the soil. Great fortunes, too, are the cause as well as the consequence of a rapid increase of wealth. No way of getting rich, it is well known, is so certain as the possession of a good deal of money. In many departments of trade there is a marked tendency to the concentration of fortunes, because the unity of management, the increased power of organization, and other causes, give a decided economical advantage to the possessors of large capitals. Enterprises become possible to them which require long foresight and the power of waiting for distant results, though they may be ultimately enormously profitable. Nor, however much may be done within a certain sphere by co-operation, has it as yet given proofs of being able successfully to contend in any wide field with individual management.

If, then, we assume that the world will continue to grow richer, it is highly probable that we shall also witness a steady accumulation of colossal fortunes. And it is therefore wiser, instead of sighing after a chimerical equality, to ask in what way they may be made useful. If fortunes increase, the number of those who regard them with envy certainly does not diminish; and though the poverty of the multitude may be in no sense produced by the accumulation of capital, it certainly makes it desirable for capitalists to occupy a position as little invidious as possible. Very rich men may be regarded with pleasure from a purely artistic point of view; but there are a good many paupers, who do not care much for art, and have a very strong appreciation of the pleasure of getting a slice of their neighbor's cake. A miser, according to political economists, is probably doing a great deal of good by his investments, whilst the spendthrift is damaging the world as well as himself. But the spendthrift is the popular character, because the immediate and tangible results of his conduct are apparently advantageous; from which it may be inferred that the miser would do wisely to dispel the popular illusion as much as possible, and to make the good effects of his saving tangible not only to the philosopher, but to the vulgar mind. Otherwise the vulgar mind may get into an unphilosophical state of irritation. The advantages, indeed, of a liberal use of wealth are too obvious to require illustration. Everybody who has any money to spend is glad to insist upon the unanswerable reasons for spending it upon himself. We are delighted to demonstrate that there ought to be a refined and cultivated class in the community, and further to decide that we, who have the money, ought to be the refined and cultivated class. Indeed, if charity reached such a pitch that everybody gave away all that may strictly be called superfluous, we should speedily become a nation of very commonplace semi-paupers; and the only, though amply sufficient, reason for not insisting upon the practice of spending a large part of our incomes on luxury as a solemn duty is that we are quite ready enough to do it without any sense of duty at all. When, however, our income reaches above a certain point, it is difficult not to go to excess in the discharge of this duty. What is to be done, then, is a question which concerns very few people. In an ideal state of things a man would perhaps consider himself simply as an officer intrusted with a large part of the national earnings, to be spent for the good of the world at large.

The late Mr. Peabody, whose death we learn with sincere regret as we write, seems to have discovered one way of approaching to this conception; and people with small incomes must often have thought that if they had a great deal more than they could possibly spend upon themselves they would endeavor to rival so noble an example. When they come to be tried, they generally find it hard to act up to the notion; and indeed the difficulty of giving away many thousands without doing more harm than good is so enormous that it is scarcely to be desired, as it certainly is not to be expected, that the example will often be literally followed out. We can only hope, in a general way, that the growth of large fortunes and the increased publicity of expenditure may gradually generate an increased sense of responsibility. There is one other circumstance which tends in the same direction, and whose action may be faintly observed in America. It is often remarked that rich men are there more liberal and public-spirited in the use of wealth. This is partly owing to the principle that what comes easily goes easily; and that, in a country where people are accustomed to the sudden growth and equally sudden disappearance of large fortunes, a man learns to care less about so transitory a possession. It is also due to the collateral result that a man who has no motive for founding a great family is without one powerful motive for retaining wealth. A decline of the old aristocratic feeling implies that the son of a very rich man will be more generally disposed to start on his own resources, and to look forward to a life of more or less hard work. There is both good and evil in this result. A man perhaps is more often hurt than benefited by inheriting a large fortune; whilst, on the other hand, it is very desirable that everybody should as a matter of course look forward to life in a counting-house or an office. Without entering upon so large a subject, we need only remark that the tendency of which this is an example is favorable to a more generous use of vast wealth, as well as to its frequent accumulation.

THE EXECUTION BY HARA-KIRI.

BY ALGERNON BERTRAM MITFORD, SECRETARY TO
H. M.'S LEGATION IN JAPAN.

I WAS sent officially to witness the execution by Hara-Kiri (self-immolation by disembowelling) of Taki Zenzaburo, the officer of the Prince of Bizen.

He it was who gave the order to fire on the foreign settlement at Hiogo. As the Hara-Kiri is one of the Japanese customs which has excited the greatest curiosity in Europe, although, owing to the fact that it had never hitherto been witnessed by foreigners, it has seemed little better than a fable, I will relate what occurred.

The ceremony, which was ordered by the Mikado himself, took place at 10.30 at night in the Temple of Seigukuji, the head-quarters of the Satsuma troops at Hiogo. A witness was sent from each of the foreign legations. We were seven foreigners in all.

We were conducted to the temple by officers of the Princes of Satsuma and Choshii. Although the ceremony was to be conducted in the most private manner, the casual remarks which we overheard in the streets, and a crowd lining the principal entrance to the temple, showed that it was a matter of no little interest to the public. The courtyard of the temple presented a most picturesque sight; it was crowded with soldiers standing about in knots round large fires, which threw a dim, flickering light over the heavy eaves and quaint gable-ends of the sacred buildings. We were shown into an inner room, where we were to wait until the preparation for the ceremony was completed; in the next room to us were the high Japanese officers. After a long interval, which seemed doubly long from the silence which prevailed, Itô Shunské, the provisional Governor of Hiogo, came and took down our names, and informed us that seven kenshi, sheriffs or witnesses, would attend on the part of the Japanese. He and another officer represented the Mikado; two captains of Satsuma's infantry, and two of Choshii's, with a representative of the Prince of Bizen, the clan of the condemned man, completed the number, which was probably arranged in order to tally with that of the foreigners. Itô Shunské further inquired whether we wished to put any questions to the prisoner. We replied in the negative.

A further delay then ensued, after which we were invited to follow the Japanese witnesses into the hondo or main hall of the temple, where the ceremony was to be performed. It was an imposing scene. A large hall with a high roof supported by dark pillars of wood. From the ceiling hung a profusion of those huge gilt lamps and ornaments peculiar to Buddhist temples. In front of the high altar, where the floor, covered with beautiful white mats, is raised some three or four inches from the ground, was laid a rug of scarlet felt. Tall candles placed at regular intervals gave out a dim, mysterious light, just sufficient to let all the proceedings be seen. The seven Japanese took their places on the left of the raised floor, the seven foreigners on the right. No other person was present.

After an interval of a few minutes of anxious suspense, Taki Zenzaburo, a stalwart man thirty-two years of age, with a noble air, walked into the hall attired in his dress of ceremony, with the peculiar hempen cloth wings which are worn on great occasions. He was accompanied by a kaishaku and three officers, who wore the zimbari or war surcoat with gold-tissue facings. The word kaishaku, it should be observed, is one to which our word executioner is no equivalent term. The office is that of a gentleman: in many cases it is performed by a kinsman or friend of the condemned, and the relation between them is rather that of principal and second than that of victim and executioner. In this instance the kaishaku was a pupil of Taki Zenzaburo, and was selected by the friends of the latter from among their own number for his skill in swordsmanship.

With the kaishaku on his left hand, Taki Zenzaburo advanced slowly towards the Japanese witnesses, and the two bowed before them, then drawing near to the foreigners they saluted us in the same way, perhaps even with more deference: in each case the salutation was ceremoniously returned. Slowly, and with great dignity, the condemned man mounted on to the raised floor, prostrated himself before the high altar twice, and seated * himself on the felt carpet with his back to the high altar, the kaishaku crouching on his left-hand side. One of the three attendant officers then came forward bearing a stand of the kind used in temples for offerings, on which, wrapped in paper, lay the wakizashi, the short sword or dirk of the Japanese, nine inches and a half in length, with a point and an edge as sharp as a razor's. This he handed, prostrating himself, to the condemned man, who received it reverently, raising it to his head with both hands, and placed it in front of himself.

After another profound obeisance, Taki Zenzaburo, in a voice which betrayed just so much emotion and hesitation as might be expected from a man who is making a painful confession, but with no sign of fear either in his face or manner, spoke as follows:—

"I, and I alone, unwarrantably gave the order to fire on the foreigners at Kôbé, and again as they tried to escape. For this crime I disembowel myself, and I beg you who are present to do me the honor of witnessing the act."

Bowing once more, the speaker allowed his upper garments to slip down to his girdle, and remained naked to the waist. Carefully, according to custom, he tucked his sleeves under his knees to prevent himself from falling backwards, for a noble Japanese gentleman should die falling forwards. Deliberately, with a steady hand, he took the dirk that lay before him; he looked at it wistfully, almost affectionately; for a moment he seemed to collect his thoughts for the last time, and then, stabbing himself deeply below the waist on the left-hand side, he drew it slowly across to the right side, and turning the dirk in the wound, gave a slight cut upwards. During this sickeningly painful operation he never moved a muscle of his face. When he drew out the dirk he leaned forward and stretched out his neck; an expression of pain for the first time crossed his face, but he uttered no sound. At that moment the kaishaku, who, still crouching by his side, had been keenly watching his every movement, sprang to his feet, poised his sword for a second in the air; there was a flash, a heavy, ugly thud, a crashing fall; with one blow the head had been severed from the body.

A dead silence followed, broken only by the hideous noise of the blood gushing out of the inert heap before us, which but a moment before had been a brave and chivalrous man. It was horrible.

The kaishaku made a low bow, wiped his sword, and retired from the raised floor; and the stained dirk was solemnly borne away, a bloody proof of the execution.

The two representatives of the Mikado then left their places, and crossing over to where the foreign witnesses sat, called us to witness that the sentence of death upon Taki Zenzaburo had been faithfully carried out. The ceremony being at an end, we left the temple.

The ceremony, to which the place and the hour gave an additional solemnity, was characterized throughout by that extreme dignity and punctiliousness which are the distinctive marks of the proceedings of Japanese gentlemen of rank; and it is important to note this fact, because it carries with it the conviction that the dead man was indeed the officer who had committed the crime, and no substitute. While profoundly impressed by the terrible scene, it was impossible at the same time not to be filled with admiration of the firm and manly bearing of the sufferer, and of the nerve with which the kaishaku performed his last duty to his master. Nothing could more strongly show the force of education. The samurai, or gentleman of the military class, from his earliest years learns to look upon the Hara-Kiri as a ceremony in which some day he may be called upon to play a part as principal or second. In old-fashioned families, which hold to the traditions of ancient chivalry, the child is instructed in the right and familiarized with the idea as an honorable expiation of crime or blotting-out of disgrace. If the hour comes, he is prepared for it, and bravely faces an ordeal which early training has robbed of half its horrors. In what other country in the world does a man learn that the last tribute of affection which he may have to pay to his best friend may be to act as his executioner?

Since I wrote the above, we have heard that, before his entry into the fatal hall, Taki Zenzaburo called round him all those of his own clan who were present, many of whom had carried out his order to fire, and addressing them in a short speech, acknowledged the heinousness of his crime and the justice of his sentence, and warned them solemnly to avoid any repetition of attacks upon foreigners. They were also addressed by the officers of the Mikado, who urged them to bear no ill-will against us on account of the fate of their fellow-clansman. They declared that they entertained no such feeling.

The opinion has been expressed that it would have been politic for the foreign representatives at the last moment to have interceded for the life of Taki Zenzaburo. The question is believed to have been debated among the representatives themselves. My own belief is that mercy, although it might have produced the desired effect among the more civilized clans, would have been mistaken for weakness and fear by those wilder people who have not yet a personal knowledge of foreigners. The offence—an attack upon the flags and subjects of all the Treaty Powers, which lack of skill, not of will, alone prevented from ending in an universal massacre—was the gravest that has been committed upon foreigners since their residence in Japan. Death was undoubtedly deserved, and the form chosen was in Japanese eyes merciful and yet judicial. The crime might have involved a war and cost hundreds of lives; it was wiped out by one death. I believe that in the interest of Japan as well as in our own, the course pursued was wise, and it was very satisfactory to me to find that one of the ablest Japanese ministers, Gotô Shojiro, with whom I had a discussion upon the subject, was quite of my opinion.

The ceremonies observed at the Hara-Kiri appear to vary slightly in detail in different parts of Japan; but the following memorandum upon the subject of the rite, as it is practised at Yeddo, clearly establishes its judicial character. I translated it from a paper drawn up for me by a Japanese who was able to speak of what he had seen himself. Three different ceremonies are described:—

1st. Ceremonies observed at the Hara-Kiri of a Hatamoto (petty noble of the Tycoon's court) in prison. This is conducted with great secrecy. Six mats are spread in a large courtyard of the prison; an ometsuké (officer whose duties appear to consist in the surveillance of other officers), assisted by two other ometsukés of the second and third class, acts as kenshi or sheriff, and sits in front of the mats. The condemned man, attired in his dress of ceremony, and wearing his wings of hempen cloth, sits in the centre of the mats. At each of the four corners of the mats sits a prison official. Two officers of the Governor of the city act as kaishaku (executioners or seconds), and take their place, one on the right hand, and the other on the left hand of the condemned.

The kaishaku on the left side, announcing his name and surname, says, bowing, "I have the honor to act as a kaishaku to you; have you any last wishes to confide to me?" The condemned man thanks him and accepts the offer or not, as the case may be. He then bows to the sheriff, and a wooden dirk nine and a half inches long is placed before him at a distance of three feet, wrapped in paper and lying on a stand such as is used for offerings in temples. As he reaches forward to take the wooden sword and stretches out his neck, the kaishaku on his left-hand side draws his sword and strikes off his head. The kaishaku on the right-hand side takes up the head and shows it to the sheriff. The body is given to the relations of the deceased for burial. His property is confiscated.

2d. The ceremonies observed at the Hara-Kiri of a daimio's retainer. When the retainer of a daimio is condemned to perform the Hara-Kiri, four mats are placed in the yard of the yashiki or palace. The condemned man, dressed in his robes of ceremony, and wearing his wings of hempen cloth, sits in the centre. An officer acts as sheriff, with a sub-sheriff under him. Two officers, who act as kaishaku, are on the right and left of the condemned man; four officers are placed at the corners of the mats. The kaishaku, as in the former case, offers to execute the last wishes of the condemned. A dirk nine and a half inches long is placed before him on a stand. In this case the dirk is a real dirk, which the man takes and stabs himself with on the left side, below the navel, drawing it across to the right side. At this moment, when he leans forward in pain, the kaishaku on the left-hand side cuts off his head. The kaishaku on the right-hand side takes up the head, and shows it to the sheriff. The body is given to the relations for burial. In most cases the property of the deceased is confiscated.

3d. Self-immolation of a daimio on account of disgrace. When a daimio has been guilty of treason or offended against the Tycoon,* inasmuch as the family is disgraced, and an apology could neither be offered nor accepted, the offended daimio disembowels himself. Calling his councillors around him, he confides to them his last will and testament for transmission to the Tycoon. Then, clothing himself in his court dress, he disembowels himself, and cuts his own throat. His councillors then report the matter to the Government, and a coroner is sent to investigate it. To him the retainers hand the last will and testament of their lord, and he takes it to the Gorōjii (1st Council), who transmit it to the Tycoon. If the offence has been heinous, such as would involve the ruin of the whole family, by the clemency of the Tycoon, half the property may be confiscated, and half returned to the heir; if the offence is trivial, the property is inherited intact by the heir, and the family do not suffer.

In all cases where the criminal disembowels himself of his own accord without condemnation and without investigation, inasmuch as he is no longer able to defend himself, the offence is considered as non-proven, and the property is not confiscated.

There are many stories on record of extraordinary heroism being displayed in the Hara-Kiri. The case of a young fellow, only twenty years old, of the Choshu clan, which was told me the other day by an eye-witness, deserves mention as a marvellous instance of determination. Not content with giving himself the one necessary cut, he slashed himself thrice horizontally and twice vertically. Then he stabbed himself in the throat until the dirk protruded on the other side, with its sharp edge to the front; setting his teeth in one supreme effort, he drove the knife forward with both hands through his throat, and fell dead.

One more story, and I have done. The Tycoon, beaten on every side, and having fled ignominiously to Yeddo, is said to have determined to fight no more, but to yield everything. A member of his second council went to him and said, "Sir, the only way for you now to retrieve the honor of the family of Tokugawa is to disembowel yourself; and to prove to you that I am sincere and disinterested in what I say, I am here ready to disembowel myself with you." The Tycoon flew into a great rage, saying that he would listen to no such nonsense, and left the room. His faithful retainer, to prove his honesty, retired to another part of the castle, and solemnly performed the Hara-Kiri.

QUIN, THE ACTOR.

AFTER the Restoration three great tragic actors followed each other in succession, — Betterton, Booth, and Quin. The latter reigned supreme when Garrick rose and eclipsed, we may almost say, dethroned him. It was the triumph of sparkling, brilliant nature over labored, ponderous art. Churchill accuses Quin of sameness; he says, no matter what he played, he lacked variety. The man superseded the actor, — "Horatio, Dorax, Falstaff, — still 't was Quin." Yet he allows him much merit; witness the following lines: —

"Quin, from afar, lured by the scent of fame,
A stage Leviathan, put in his claim,
Pupil of Betterton and Booth. . . .
His words bore sterling weight, nervous and strong,
In many tides of sense they rolled along,
Happy in art, he chiefly had pretence
To keep up numbers, yet not forfeit sense.
No actor ever greater heights could reach
In all the labored artifice of speech."

And Chetwood says he was the chief pillar that supported all the theatres wherever he performed.

Quin was not only celebrated as an actor, but also as a gourmand, and constitutional joker. The smart sayings he actually uttered suffice to fill a goodly volume, while those fathered on him would swell the bulk to two or three more. They are generally so well known that, with but a few exceptions, the recapitulation would be tiresome. We therefore spare our readers the decies repetita placebit, which may be true though we do not believe in it, and pass on to biography.

Soon after the death of Mr. Quin, a pamphlet appeared, entitled "The Life of James Quin, Comedian," with the History of the Stage, from his commencing Actor to his Retreat to Bath. 12mo, printed for Bladon, 1766. From that life, which abounds in misstatements and inaccuracies, the account in the "Biographical Dictionary," published in 1767, is taken, where it has since continued to misinform the reader through several editions. It is almost unnecessary to add that no regard is due to the authority of this pamphlet, or of the Biographical Dictionary in this particular instance. In 1805, a memoir of Quin appeared in the "Theatrical Dictionary." In 1831, Galt included Quin in his "Lives of the Players," while various desultory particulars respecting him are to be found in "His Majesty's Servants," by Dr. Doran, published so recently as 1864. All the different lives of Garrick abound in Quiniana.

James Quin was born in King Street, Covent Garden, on the 24th of February, 1693. His ancestors were of an ancient family in the kingdom of Ireland. His father, James Quin, was bred at Trinity College, Dublin, from whence he came to England, entered himself of Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar; but his father, Mark Quin, who had been Lord Mayor of Dublin in 1676, dying about that period, and leaving him a plentiful estate, he quitted England in 1700, for his native country, taking with him his son, the subject of our present narrative.

The marriage of Quin's father was attended with circumstances which affected the interest of his son so materially as probably to influence his future destination in life. His mother was a reputed widow, who had been married to a person in the mercantile line, and who left her, to pursue some traffic or particular business in the West Indies. He had been absent nearly seven years, without her having received any letter from, or the least information respecting him. He was even given out to be dead, which report was universally credited. She went into mourning for him, and some time after, Quin's father, who is said to have then possessed an estate of £1,000 a year, paid his addresses to her, and married her. The consequence of this marriage was James Quin. His parents continued for some time in an undisturbed state of happiness, when the first husband returned, claimed his wife, and obtained possession of her. Quin the elder retired with his son, to whom he is said to have left his property. Victor says this was stated by the actor to two gentlemen, some time before his death. Another and more probable account, derived from Chetwood, is, that the estate was suffered to pass to the heir-at-law, and the illegitimacy of James Quin being proved, he was dispossessed of it, and left to shift for himself.

Our actor received his early education in Dublin, under Dr. Jones, until the death of his father in 1710, when the progress of it was interrupted, we may presume, by the litigation which arose respecting his estate. It is generally admitted that he was deficient in literature; and it has been said that he laughed at those who pored over books by way of inquiry after knowledge, affirming that he read men, — that the world was the best book.

This account seems to be founded in truth, and proves the strength of his natural understanding, which enabled him to establish so considerable a reputation as a man of sense and ability.

Deprived thus of the property he expected, and with no profession to support him, though intended for the law, Quin appears to have reached the age of twenty-one. He had, therefore, nothing to rely upon but the exercise of his talents, and with these he supplied the deficiencies of fortune. The theatre in Dublin was then struggling for an establishment, and there he made his first essay. The part he performed was Abel in the "Committee," in the year 1714; and he represented a few other characters, as Cleon in "Timon of Athens," the Prince of Tanais in "Tamerlane," and so on, but all of equal insignificance. After performing for one season in Dublin, he was advised by Chetwood, the prompter, not to smother his rising genius in a kingdom where there was, at that time, no great encouragement for merit. This advice he adopted, and came to London, where he was immediately received into the company at Drury Lane. He subsequently repaid the friendship of Chetwood by a recommendation which enabled the latter to follow him to the English metropolis.

At that period it was usual for young actors to take inferior characters, and to rise gradationally, as they displayed skill and improvement. In conformity to this practice the parts allotted to Quin were not calculated to procure much celebrity for him.

He acted the Lieutenant of the Tower in Rowe's "Lady Jane Grey," the Steward in Gay's "What d'ye call it?" and Vulture in "The Country Lasses"; all produced in 1715. In December, 1716, he obtained a part of more consequence, — Antenor in Mrs. Centliore's "Cruel Gift"; but in the beginning of the next year we find him degraded to speak about a dozen lines as the Second Player in "Three Hours after Marriage."

Accident, however, had just before procured him an opportunity which he did not neglect. An order had been sent from the Lord Chamberlain to revive the play of "Tamerlane," on the 4th of November, 1716. It had accordingly been got up with great magnificence. On the third night, Mills, who performed Bajazet, was suddenly taken ill, and application was made to Quin to read the part; a task which he executed so much to the satisfaction of the audience, that he received a considerable share of applause. The next night he made himself perfect, and the bursts of approbation were redoubled. . . .

But he grew impatient of his slow progress at Drury Lane, and determined upon trying his fortune next at Rich's theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields, then under the management of Keene and Christopher Bullock. Chetwood insinuates that envy influenced some of the Drury Lane authorities to depress so rising an actor. Be that as it may, he continued at the theatre he had chosen seventeen years, and during that period supported without discredit the same characters which were then admirably sustained at the rival establishment.

Not long after he quitted Drury Lane, an unfortunate transaction took place, which threatened to interrupt, if not entirely to stop his theatrical pursuits. This was an unlucky encounter between him and Bowen, which ended fatally to the latter. From the evidence given at the trial, it appeared that on the 17th of April, 1718, about four or five o'clock in the afternoon, Bowen and Quin met accidentally at the Fleece Tavern in Cornhill. They drank together in a friendly manner, jested with each other for some time, until at length the conversation turned on their stage performances. Bowen said that Quin had acted Tamerlane in a loose sort of manner; and Quin, in retort, observed that his opponent had no occasion to value himself on his own performances, since Mr. Johnson, who had but seldom represented Jacomo in the "Libertine," played it as well as he who had acted it often. Those observations probably irritated them both, and the conversation changed, but to another subject not better calculated to restore good-humor, — the honesty of each party. In the course of the altercation, Bowen asserted that he was as honest a man as any in the world, which occasioned a story about his political tenets to be introduced by Quin. Both parties being warm, a wager was laid on the subject, which was determined in favor of Quin, on his relating that Bowen sometimes drank the health of the Duke of Ormond, and at others refused it; at the same time asking the referee, how he could be as honest a man as any in the world, who acted upon two different principles? The gentleman who had been selected as umpire then told Bowen that if he insisted upon his claim, he must give it against him. Here the dispute seemed to have ended, nothing in the rest of the conversation indicating any remains of resentment in either party. Soon afterwards, however, Bowen arose, threw down his share of the reckoning, and left the company. In about a quarter of an hour, Quin was called out by a porter sent by Bowen, and Quin and Bowen both went together, first to the Swan Tavern, and then to the Pope's Head, where a rencontre took place, in which Bowen received a wound of which he died within three days after. In the course of the evidence it was sworn that Bowen, after he had received the wound, declared that there had been nothing but fair play, that he was in the wrong, and that if he died he freely forgave his antagonist.

On this evidence Quin was, on the 10th of July, found guilty of manslaughter, and soon after returned to his employment on the stage. This unhappy incident was not calculated to impress a favorable opinion of his temper on the public mind. When it is fairly considered in all its circumstances, it leaves not much stain upon his character. Nearly twenty years later, he had the misfortune to be entangled in a second quarrel, which ended equally in a case of homicide.

There was in the theatre at Lincoln's Inn Fields a subaltern player, or "faggot," as the professional term went, whose name never made its appearance in the bills; Williams was his appellation, a native of Wales, and not the least choleric of his countrymen. He performed the Messenger in "Cato," and saying "Cæsar sends health to Cato," pronounced the last word Keeto. This struck so discordantly on Quin's ear, that he instantly replied, "Would he had sent it by a better messenger!" Williams's hot blood boiled over, and he vowed revenge. He followed Quin into the green-room when he came off the stage, and after representing the injury he had done him by making him appear ridiculous in the eyes of the audience, and thereby hurting him in his profession, he then called him to account as a gentleman, and insisted on satisfaction. Quin endeavored to rally him out of his passion, but this only added fuel to the rage of his antagonist, who, without further remonstrance, retired and waited for Quin upon the piazza; as he approached, Williams drew upon him, and a duel ensued, in which Williams fell. Again, Quin came to fisticuffs with Aaron Hill, on some criticism which had displeased him, and finally fought a third duel in Covent Garden with Theophilus Cibber, in which both were slightly wounded, and then returned to the company they had left at a tavern, and abused each other in choice Billingsgate, until stopped by general interference.

Theophilus Cibber was a compound of coxcomb and the braggadocio Pistol he so often represented. He was thoroughly worthless and contemptible in a moral sense: connived, it was said, at his accomplished wife's adultery, and then obtained ten pounds in an action for damages against her seducer. He was drowned in the wreck of a packet, on his passage from Parkgate to Dublin, in 1759.

But though Quin was pugnacious and irascible, sarcastic on the bewitching Woffington, and positively rude to the sharp-tongued Clive, he was anything but a morose character. He had a warm heart and a generous disposition, of which he gave many remarkable proofs. Amongst the most noted was his conduct to Thomson, the poet of "The Seasons," for whom he professed and felt the highest esteem. Hearing that Thomson was confined in a sponging-house, for a debt of about seventy pounds, he repaired to the place. Thomson was a little disconcerted at seeing him, and the more so as Quin announced that he had come to sup with him, and that, as he supposed, it would have been inconvenient to have had the supper dressed at the place they were in, he had ordered it from an adjacent tavern, and, as a prelude, half a dozen of claret was introduced. The repast being over, Quin said, "It is time now we should balance accounts. The pleasure I have had in perusing your works I cannot estimate at less than a hundred pounds, and I insist on now acquitting the debt." On saying this, he put down a note and took his leave, without waiting for a reply. But Quin had soon the pleasure to see him in affluence, Thomson having obtained the place, not requiring residence, of Surveyor-General of the Leeward Islands. After Thomson's death, Quin delivered the prologue to his "Coriolanus," written by Lord Lyttelton; in it his feelings so completely mastered him, that it has always been commemorated as one of the tenderest exhibitions that ever the stage displayed.

Quin had a sort of pupil, whom he had helped to bring upon the stage, named Richard Winstone. He was not without talent, but one of those ill-starred beings who never prospered do what he might. The great actor distinguished him by especial notice, and occasionally admitted him to his convivial enjoyments. Winstone once quarrelled with the manager, and abruptly leaving London, contrary to the advice of his patron, went strolling into Wales. After two years' absence, on his return from Swansea to Bristol by sea, he was nearly drowned, having encountered a storm which stranded the ship, and occasioned the loss of all his clothes and what little money he had in his strong box. In this situation he scrambled up to London, and going to one of his old haunts in the purlieus of Covent Garden, went to bed, and sulked for two days without getting out of it. Quin by accident heard of the plight he was in, and immediately calling on the manager, had Winstone restored to his former salary, and his name actually advertised in the bills for the next day's performance. He then called upon his tailor, who, having Winstone's measure, went with him to Monmouth Street and bought a full suit. Thus accoutred, Quin called upon his old friend, whom he found in bed, very melancholy. After some conversation, in which Winstone related all his misfortunes, Quin asked him why he was not at rehearsal. This at first astonished poor Winstone, till the other explaining the circumstance of his re-engagement, he fell upon his knees with gratitude. "But, my dear friend," says Winstone, "what shall I do for clothes and a little money?" "As for the clothes," replied Quin, "there they are; but as for money, you must put your hand in your own pocket." Winstone did so, and on searching the breeches pocket, found ten guineas, which his friend's humanity had placed there.

When Miss Bellamy came out, Quin took her warmly by the hand, and ever continued to her the kindness and affection of a father. His attachment to Ryan was a life-long affair. After his final retirement he came up from Bath on two successive occasions to play Falstaff for his benefit, by which act of kindness Ryan cleared large sums.

The same favor being solicited a third time Quin, who had lost some of his front teeth, declined in the following lines: "I would play for you if I could, but I will not whistle Falstaff for any man. I have willed you £1,000; if you want money you may have it at once, and save my executors trouble."

During his early career Quin made a great advance when Rich revived the "Merry Wives of Windsor," in 1720. There was no one in the company willing to undertake the part of Falstaff. Quin boldly offered to venture it. "How," said Rich, taking a double pinch of snuff, "you attempt Falstaff? Why you might as well think of acting Cato after Booth! The character of Falstaff, young man, is quite another affair from what you think"—and taking an increased pinch of snuff,—"it is not a little, snivelling part that—that—in short, any one can do. There is not a man amongst you that has any idea of it but myself. It is quite beyond your mark. Don't think of it for a moment, young man." Quin, however, persevered, carried his point, and in his hands Falstaff became one of the established ornaments of the English stage.

In 1731 all the great actors had died or retired, and Quin found himself without a competitor. But his full merit was not allowed him until he succeeded Booth as Cato in 1733-4. In undertaking a part so completely identified with his predecessor he showed great good taste. Instead of announcing his name in the bills in the ordinary form, he paid a just compliment to the town and the merits of Booth by having it stated that the part of Cato would be only attempted by Mr. Quin. The propriety of this announcement was duly appreciated. A full house was the consequence, and the actor did not disappoint it when he said, speaking of the death of his son Marcus, "Thanks to the gods—my boy has done his duty!" the whole audience were so affected that there was a universal shout of "Booth outdone!" Nor was this all; he was encored in the famous soliloquy, and tradition still continues to repeat that Cato as embodied by Quin was one of the finest parts ever represented on any stage.

In 1739, Quin, then in the height of his reputation, visited Dublin as a star. He was accompanied by Gifford. They drew crowded houses. Quin's benefit at Smock Alley reached £126, at that time esteemed a great sum. He went again in 1741-2 to the Aungier Street theatre, and opened in his grand part of Cato to as crowded an audience as the house could contain. Next came Mrs. Clive in Lappet, and then Ryan in Iago to Quin's Othello. Mrs. Clive so far mistook her abilities as to play Lady Townly and Cordelia to Quin's Lord Townly and Lear, but she made ample amends by her Nell, "Virgin Unmasked," and "Country Wife." Quin went with the company to Cork and Limerick, and returned to Dublin before the close of the year. On the 21st of December, Mrs. Cibber made her first appearance in Ireland as Indiana to Quin's Young Bevil in the "Conscious Lovers." Her agreement with the proprietors was for £800, which they were well enabled to pay from the money she drew, though her first night the receipts fell under £10. The state of the Irish stage was then so low that it was often found that the whole amount of the house was not more than sufficient to discharge Mr. Quin's engagement; but so attentive was he to his own interest, and so rigid in demanding his bond, that he more than once refused to let the curtain be drawn until the money was regularly brought to him. He returned to London in 1742, and does not appear to have obtained an immediate engagement. Garrick had risen during his absence and eclipsed him. Some accounts say that Quin went again to Ireland in 1743 on the chance of an engagement, but not effecting his object, returned in disgust.

From 1743 to 1747 Quin continued to oppose the sweeping popularity of Garrick, but with indifferent success. In 1747 came on the great engagement at Covent Garden, where they were fairly pitted against each other, and appeared together in the "Fair Penitent" as Horatio and Lothario, in "Henry IV." as Falstaff and Hotspur, and in "Jane Shore" as Gloster and Hastings. In the first and last Garrick carried away the palm. In the second Quin left him behind. Hotspur was comparatively a failure, to be classed with Garrick's Othello and Gil Blas.

He resigned it after the fifth night, and never resumed the part again. Some incorrect biographers have stated that during this competition "Venice Preserved," "The Distressed Mother," and "Julius Cæsar" were also produced, and have even gone so far as to describe certain effects produced by the contending champions. This is purely fabulous. The three plays above named were in contemplation, but certainly not acted. The bills preserved in the British Museum, with the registry of dates and performances in Genest's history of the stage, prove this beyond dispute.

At the end of the season of 1748, Quin having taken offence at the conduct of Rich, his manager, retired in a fit of resentment from the theatre, although then under engagements. Some time after, having indulged his spleen, he began to relent, and wrote as follows: "I am at Bath. — QUIN." The answer was equally laconic: "Stay there and be damned. — RICH." However, they ultimately made up the quarrel, and Quin returned to him. On the 15th of May, 1751, he appeared for the last time as an engaged actor as Horatio in the "Fair Penitent," to the Lothario of Barry and the Calista of Mrs. Cibber. We have already seen that for two successive years after he came up from Bath to which gay city he had retired to act Falstaff for his friend Ryan's benefit.

Quin was sixty when he finally retired. Not long before, he performed Chamont in the "Orphan" a fiery young soldier, in a long, grisly, half-powdered wig, hanging low on each side of his breast, and down the back; a heavy scarlet coat and waistcoat, trimmed with broad gold lace, black velvet breeches, a black silk neckcloth, black stockings, high-heeled square-toed shoes, with old-fashioned stone buckles; and a pair of stiff high-topped white gloves, with a broad, old scalloped hat. Were the youthful brother of Monimeci to appear on the stage in such a dress now, Otway's affecting tragedy would produce more laughter than tears.

While speaking of the Orphan the following epistolical digression, touching the foundation of the play, may not be considered altogether irrelevant.

The father of Charles Brandon, afterwards Duke of Suffolk, retired, on the death of his lady, to the borders of Hampshire. His family consisted of two sons, and a young lady, the daughter of a friend lately deceased, whom he adopted as his own child. This lady, being singularly beautiful, as well as amiable in her disposition, attracted the affections of both the brothers; the elder, however, was the favorite, and he privately married her, which the other not knowing, and overhearing an appointment of the lovers to meet the next night in her bedchamber, he contrived to get his brother otherwise employed, and made the signal of admission himself, thinking it a mere intrigue; unfortunately he succeeded. On discovery, the lady lost her reason, and soon after died. The two brothers fought, and the elder fell. The father broke his heart in a few months afterwards. The younger brother, Charles Brandon, the unintentional author of all this family misery, quitted England in despair, with a fixed determination of never returning. Being abroad for several years, his nearest relations supposed him dead, and began to take the necessary steps for obtaining his estates; when, roused by this intelligence, he returned privately to England, and for a time took obscure lodgings in the vicinity of his family mansion.

While he was in this retreat, the young king (Henry VIII.) who had just buried his father, was one day hunting on the confines of Hampshire, when he heard the cries of a female in distress in an adjoining wood. His gallantry immediately summoned him to the place, though he then happened to be detached from all his courtiers, when he saw two ruffians attempting to violate the honor of a young lady. The king instantly drew on them, and a scuffle ensued, which roused the revelry of Charles Brandon, who was taking his morning's walk in an adjacent thicket. He immediately ranged himself on the side of the king, whom he then did not know, and, by his dexterity, soon disarmed one of the ruffians, while the other fled. The king, charmed with this act of gallantry, so congenial to his own mind, inquired the name and family of the stranger, and not only repossessed him of his patrimonial estates, but took him under his immediate protection.

It was this same Charles Brandon who afterwards privately married Henry's sister, Margaret, Queen Dowager of France, which marriage the king not only forgave, but created him Duke of Suffolk, and continued his favor towards him to the last hour of the Duke's life.

He died before Henry, and the latter showed in his attachment to this nobleman, that notwithstanding his fits of capriciousness and cruelty, he was capable of a cordial and steady friendship. He was sitting in council when the news of Suffolk's death reached him, and he publicly took that occasion, both to express his own sorrow, and to commemorate the merits of the deceased. He declared that during the whole course of their acquaintance his brother-in-law had not made a single attempt to injure any one; "and are there any of you, my lords, who can say as much?" When the king subjoined these words, says the historian, he looked round on all their faces, and appeared to enjoy the confusion which the consciousness of secret guilt naturally threw upon them. Otway took his plot from the facts above narrated; but to avoid, perhaps, interfering with a circumstance which might affect some noble families, at that time living, he laid the scene of his tragedy in Bohemia. There was, and in all probability is still, at Woburn Abbey, the seat of the Dukes of Bedford, a large painting of the above-named incident.

Quin lived and died a bachelor. Although a sensualist rather than an anchorite, no illegitimate offspring were ever laid to his charge. When asked why, in his independent circumstances, he did not marry, take a house, and set up an equipage, he replied, "I carry a coach, a wife, and a dinner always in my pocket, and I can either take the number, obtain a divorce, or turn off my cook whenever I please."

The Prince of Wales, father of George III., considering Quin a first-rate elocutionist, appointed him to instruct his children in good English. Under his tuition they acted several plays at Leicester House, "Cato" being one, in which Prince George represented Portius. Galt says he was rewarded with a pension on the civil list for his services, but this is, at least, apocryphal. When Quin heard of the graceful manner in which George III. delivered his first speech in Parliament, he cried out, "Ay, I taught the boy to speak."

This celebrated actor enjoyed his otium cum dignitate at Bath for fourteen years, during which time he lived in the best society, and was much courted for his convivial habits, and habitual pleasantries. One day he was ironically complimented by a noble lord who was a placeman on his happy retreat from public life. "Look ye, my lord," said he, "perhaps 'tis a sinecure your lordship would not accept of; but I can assure you I gave up £1,400 a year for it." This was probably the same illustrious peer who said to him, "Quin, what a pity it is that such a clever fellow as you are should be a player!" "What would your lordship have me?" was the reply, — "a lord?" Quin had not, however, always the wit on his side. Once, on a journey to Somersetshire, having put up for a few days at a farm-house, he turned his horse to grass and lost him. Upon asking a country fellow if there were any thieves or horse-stealers in the neighborhood, Hodge answered, "No; we be all honest folk here, but there 's one Quin, I think they call him, a strolling play-actor from Lunnun; mayhap he may have stole him."

While Quin was on the stage his best parts were reputed to be Cato, Brutus, Zanga, the Falstaffs, Pierre, Apemantus, Bishop Gardiner in "Lady Jane Grey," the Ghost in "Hamlet," Volpone, and Ventidius. His Othello, Macbeth, Chamont, young Bevil, Lear, and Richard were all bad; and nothing could be more absurd than his persisting to act these characters in opposition to Garrick and Barry. In Sir John Brute, his natural requisites exceeded those of Garrick, and there were many who in that part gave him the pre-eminence over his great competitor. Churchill amongst others adopted that opinion. He says, "In Brute he shone unequalled; all agree Garrick's not half so great a Brute as he."

It was observed of Beau Nash, the king of Bath, that though he was very curious about other people's pedigrees, he seldom mentioned his own. Quin was one night somewhat severe upon him on this subject, and compared him to Gil Blas, who was ashamed of his father. "Look ye, James," said Nash, "I seldom mention my father in company, not because I have any reason to be ashamed of him, but because he has some reason to be ashamed of me."

One evening Quin was drinking a bottle with Mallet the poet, and having given his opinion rather too freely on some of that very indifferent bard's productions, he got so out of temper that his companion could not please him in anything he said for the remainder of the evening. At length, he offered to wager a dozen of claret that Mallet did not contradict the next thing he said. "What's that?" asked Mallet. "Why," replied Quin, "that you are the greatest poet in England." He was one night going on the stage in the character of Cato when Mrs. Cibber pulled him back, to tell him he had a hole in his stocking. "Darned stockings I detest," said Quin; "that seems premeditated poverty." When, in his last illness, the faculty were much divided in their opinion concerning his recovery, his apothecary never had any doubt about it. One day, after feeling his patient's pulse, Quin asked him what he thought now. "Why, sir," answered the disciple of Galen, "I think you 'll do very well if we can raise a sweat." "Then," said Quin, "only send in your bill, and I warrant you the thing is done."

The first time Quin was invited to dine upon turtle, — he must have been then a very young man, — he was asked whether he preferred the callipash to the callipee; and upon his acknowledging his ignorance, the donor of the treat, a West Indian, burst into a loud laugh, saying, "He thought so great an epicure as Mr. Quin could not be unacquainted with the exquisite niceties of such an elegant dish." "It may be an elegant dish," said Quin, "but if it had been fit for Christians we should have been acquainted with it as soon as the wild Indians."

Having had an invitation from a certain nobleman, who was reputed to keep a very choice table, to dine with him, Quin waited upon his lordship and found the regale far from answering his expectations.

Upon his taking leave, the servants, who were very numerous, arranged themselves in the hall. Quin, finding that if he disbursed, as was the expected custom, to the whole regiment, it would dip rather heavily into his pocket, asked which was the cook? She readily answered, "Me, sir." He then inquired for the butler, who was as quick in replying as the other; when he said to the first, "Here 's half a crown for my eating," and to the other, "Here 's five shillings for my wine, but I never made so bad a dinner for the money in my life."

But his sayings, though usually coarse and broadly humorous, were not always so; sometimes he deviated into refinement and delicacy. Being asked by a lady why there were more women in the world than men, "It is," said he, "in conformity with the arrangements of nature, madam, we always see more of heaven than of earth." On another occasion, a lady, in speaking of transmigration, inquired of him, "What creature's form would you hereafter prefer to inhabit?" The lady had a very beautiful neck; Quin looked at it and said, "A fly's, madam, that I might sometimes have the pleasure of resting on your ladyship's neck."

While Quin continued to be an actor, professional jealousy operated as a check upon any great intimacy or cordiality between him and Garrick; but when all competition had ceased they reciprocated cordial friendship. The visits of the former to Hampton became frequent. The last time occurred in 1765, shortly after Garrick's return from Italy. While at this seat of hospitality, an eruption came out on his hand, which it was apprehended would turn to a mortification, and occasion the loss of it. This circumstance affected his spirits and threw him into a hypochondria, which brought on a fever when he was out of all danger on account of his hand. During his illness he had taken such quantities of bark as to occasion an incessant drought, which nothing could assuage, and being willing to live as long as he could without pain, he discontinued taking any medicine for upwards of a week before his death, and during that period was in good spirits.

The day before he died he drank a bottle of claret, and being sensible of his approaching end, he said, "He could wish that the last tragic scene was over, though he was in hopes he should be able to go through it with becoming dignity." In this expectation he was not disappointed; he died at his house in Bath, Tuesday, January 21st, 1766, aged seventy-four, about four o'clock in the morning, and on the Friday following was interred in the Abbey Church. His will is a regular curiosity in that line. Half his earnings he sank for an annuity. The other moiety he retained in his own hands that he might leave tokens of regard and legacies to all who had any claim on him. In the list he included two or three who had none, simply for the reason, as stated, that having promised to do so, he was not inclined to retract his word once given. A marble tablet is erected to his memory, consisting of a bust in relief, under which are inscribed the following elegant lines from the pen of David Garrick:—

"That tongue which set the table in a roar,
And charm'd the public ear, is heard no more:
Close'd are those eyes the harbingers of wit,
Which spake before the tongue what Shakespeare writ!
Cold is that hand, which living was stretch'd forth
At friendship's call, to succor modest worth.
Here lies James Quin, — deign, reader, to be taught,
Whate'er thy strength of body, force of thought,
In Nature's happiest mould, however cast,
To this complexion thou must come at last."

DR. CUMMING AND THE COUNCIL.

BY CHARLES LEVER.

THERE is a story told of the first Liberator, — one ought to be particular, for the dynasty is supposed to be continued in the person of the present Premier, — which is not unworthy of being recorded. The great Daniel, when taking a sauntering ride in the neighborhood of his house at Caherciveen, had occasion to ask an urchin to open a gate for him. The little fellow complied with much alacrity, and looked up with such an honest pleasure at rendering the slight service, that O'Connell, by way of saying something, — anything, — asked, "What's your name, boy?" "Daniel O'Connell, sir," replied he, stoutly. "And who's your father?" demanded the astonished Liberator. "Daniel O'Connell, sir." O'Connell muttered a word or two below his breath, and then added aloud, "When I see you again I'll give you sixpence."

Riding briskly on, he soon forgot the incident, and fell to thinking of much graver matters, when, after some miles of way, he found his path obstructed by some fallen timber, which a boy was stoutly endeavoring to remove. On looking more closely he discovered it to be the same he had met in the morning. "What!" cried he, "how do you come to be here now?" "You said, sir, the next time you seen me you'd give me sixpence," said the little fellow, wiping the perspiration from his brow. "Here it is," said Daniel; "you are my son, — the devil a doubt of it!" I am not sure I should have remembered this story if I had not been reminded of it by the correspondence between the Pope and Dr. Cumming, though I have to own that all resemblance between the incidents breaks down in the catastrophe.

Like the urchin on the gate, Dr. Cumming, with the same hazy notion of how the paternity is to be established, persists in assuring the Holy Father that he is his son; and like O'Connell, the Pope, not anticipating any ill consequences from the acknowledgment, nods him an easy recognition, and rides on. Cumming, charmed with what he construes to himself to be a favorable reception, and thinking doubtless to what good purpose he could turn such a valuable relationship, albeit not perfectly legitimate, takes a short cut across the fields, and comes up with his Holiness again — but this time grown more confident, it is to say, how he'd like to have a little talk with the Holy Father on the subject of the family property.

It is here that the Pope behaves less generously than the Liberator. Instead of recognizing in the bumptious urchin traits of unblushing impudence and roguery; instead of seeing how inevitably all that craft and subtlety point to an identity of origin, — he is only indignant at the persistent impertinence, and tells him to be off — that he knows nothing of him at all, and that it never occurred to him to let him inside his house, or permit him to claim kith or kindred with him.

There is no doubt his Holiness might have been more gracious; he was expecting a large party, and the presence of a poor relation the more or less would not have marred the festivity; and it would have been a fine thing for the out-at-elbows connection to be able to go about snob-fashion talking of that evening I spent at the Vatican, with what Pius said to me, and what I observed to Antonelli, — all the more comfortably that he need never dread a contradiction. Perhaps the Pope saw this; perhaps it was the very peril he desired to avoid.

That the intruder could have seriously disturbed the harmony of the company could scarcely have been feared; the overwhelming majority against him could have given him scant chance of such success; nor is it to be presumed that he is so possessed of the gift of tongues that, were he even tolerated, he could express himself in any language, ancient or modern, which would be intelligible to the assembly.

What he wanted was in reality pretty much what Alpine clubbists seem to aspire to, to say he was "there," and to make such capital out of that fact as it was capable of.

Any one at all conversant with the Continent must have met from time to time certain zealous, but not remarkably sagacious, clergymen of the Established Church on their way to Rome, under the impression that they had a special mission to expose the errors of Romanism and convert the Pope. The formula which expressed this mission was, "Going to beard the lion in his den."

I cannot say how often I have heard this courageous determination from very pale-faced, nervous young parsons, whose hectic cheeks alternately flushed and paled as they uttered the menace. It was possible to question the good sense of this proceeding, but no one could doubt of its sincerity.

Giving them every credit for intention and capacity, it is still somewhat absurd to suppose that the dogmas of Romanism must be assailed at Rome. Surely we need not go to Japan to discuss the Happy Dispatch, or take lodgings at Cork to revise the duty on butter!

The supposed bearding of the lion, then, is of all heroic achievements one of the safest, and not a whit more hazardous than the visit of a very frisky lamb to the king of beasts in the Zoo,—well knowing that he is enclosed within the stout bars of a strong cage, and thinking of nothing less than the bleatings of his noisy challenger.

Nothing short of enormous vanity—a clerical error very often—could make any man imagine that the small arm of his controversial ability could avail anything against that massive old fortress of craft and subtlety which it has taken ages to build and to strengthen. Certainly no layman,—no man occupied in the hard work of life, conversant with the ways, the thoughts, and the passions of his fellow-men—could have fallen into such a palpable blunder. Nor is it very easy to imagine greater discomfiture that could befall these men than to be taken at their word, and find themselves confronted with the most trained scholars of controversy, the most acute and practised dialecticians, the world possesses.

The practice, however, had in a great measure fallen into disuse. Whether it was that the parsons found a number of other pleasant things to do at Rome, or that the lion did not know, when he was tickled by straws poked through his cage, that he was being "bearded," I cannot say; but so it was, for some years back, there has been little done in the way of "bearding."

Dr. Cumming has, however, shown us that the spirit survives, and declares he is ready for this bold enterprise. It is true he has read of Savonarola, and he prepares his friends to hear very gloomy news of him. Lest he should have the misfortune to be burned before he was heard,—to grace a pile before he had adorned a platform,—he prudently asks, "Does the Pope expect me?" and Dr. Manning assures him that his Holiness never so much as heard of him: in fact, strange as it may seem, the great Doctor has reversed the adage, and has to learn "that it is only in his own country he is a prophet."

So far as I can ascertain, there is a large number of people who would hesitate before intrusting the advocacy of the Reformed Church to Doctor Cumming. They have tolerably strong convictions of the truth of their creed at this moment, and they would be proportionately unwilling to shake the grounds of their belief by any weakness in its defence.

There was some years ago a trial for murder in Ireland, where the evidence was so palpably insufficient that the judge stopped the case, and directed the jury to a verdict of not guilty. A well-known lawyer, who desired, however, to do something for the fee he had received for the defence, claimed the privilege of addressing the Court. "We'll hear you with pleasure, Mr. B.," said the judge; "but, to prevent accidents, we'll first acquit the prisoner."

Now I should be glad to "prevent accidents" here, and I am quite as well pleased that the Doctor is not to be heard for the defence. When one thinks of all the trouble and explanation it costs him to make foreigners understand that the knickerbockered youths of slouching gait and volunteer awkwardness are not "Coldstreams" nor "Fusi-leers," it is a relief not to be obliged to state that "Dr. Cumming from Scotland," as the Pope calls him, is neither a Bishop of St. David's nor a Dean of Westminster.

It is not impossible, however, that the Pope may read our newspapers, and may have seen what interruption to public business, and what ridicule upon the administration of law, was lately thrown by the importunate insistence of an old lady to plead her own case before the highest tribunal of the land. With the dread of such a scene at the Vatican as we have lately witnessed at Westminster, and with the consciousness that in confuting or suppressing such an advocate there is no victory, his Holiness may well be reluctant to incur the amount of shame such an exhibition is sure to evoke.

O'Connell was so proud of the boy's acuteness, that he was charmed to acknowledge the paternity. Not so the Pope; perhaps, indeed, craft and knavery were qualities that he regarded as a mere drug, and that in importing such to Rome the poor Doctor was but bringing coals to Newcastle; and perhaps, too, the Protestant craft was such very Brummagem subtlety, that his Holiness, who knew the real metal, could afford to despise it: at all events, he declines to receive Dr. Cumming except he come on his knees as a penitent, prepared "to cast away all preconceived and adverse opinions, and to lay aside all desire of disputation." Now this is surely a hard condition. The Doctor knows what an éclat it would give him,—what power and what prestige he might derive from the mere fact that he had been to Rome,—how triumphantly he could relate on his return what he had or what he would have said,—how he had routed that learned conclave,—"fluttered those Volscians" of cardinals; and all this, while, of our own bishops,—the regulars of the Church,—not one had offered himself for the crusade. What a triumph would it have been, then, to that Garibaldi of Theology, that he had gone alone and unaided, armed with such rusty old weapons as he could find, and engaged the ancient enemy of his faith, at the very gates of his own stronghold!

The Doctor is modest, certainly; he hears of a great concert, and he merely asks leave to come and play a little solo on the bagpipe, of his own composing; he does not pretend it will suit the general character of the music; nor does he affect to say that it will harmonize with any part of the performance. It's only a little Scotch air, he says, but there are people so fond of it down in Aberdeen—shire, they might, perhaps, like to hear it at Rome. The Pope, however, wants the oratorio to go off well, and he dreads discords; and if this strange performer with his wind-bag gets in, Heaven knows what disturbance may follow!

"You acknowledged I was your son a few days ago," cries Cumming, reproachfully.

"I don't know that I did," replies the Pope; "but as I have a very large illegitimate family, it's not impossible you may belong to them. At all events, I don't desire your company when I am entertaining my respectable relations. Except you bind yourself to say nothing about the connection, and hold your tongue, I decline to receive you." O'Connell was more generous, and it only cost him sixpence!

THE EARLY YEARS OF ALEXANDER SMITH.

It is impossible to find any fault with this book,* and it is nearly as difficult to find anything particular in it to praise. The writer has stored up in his memory many kindly and minute reminiscences of Alexander Smith, — an undoubted poet, who seems to us to have been rather hardly entreated by the reading public, — and he has noted down these random recollections in an easy, gossiping, amiable fashion, which has just a trifle of dullness in its composition. That dullness we trace chiefly to the want of anything like incident in the story which Mr. Brisbane tells. Smith's early life was singularly uneventful, and, always apart from his one great ambition, remarkably commonplace. Constitutionally shy and timid, the author of the "Life-Drama" seems never to have been visited with those strange freaks of self-assertion and theatrical vaporings which have prefaced many a sober and thoughtful manhood. It is true, there are some letters quoted by Mr. Brisbane which show Smith, then a young man, aiming at a good deal of self-conscious fine writing; and, indeed, whoever has read Smith's poems will look with some curiosity on certain phrases and notions which are the rude germs of lines that subsequently became famous. As an instance of this we quote one letter, — a very boyish production, for which one must make great allowances: —

MONDAY EVENING.

DEAR TOM, — As we talked this night last week, a few stars were visible in my spirit sky; those visible looked dreary and cold. One has gone out since. Let it go. A star, "my life's star," burneth, and will burn: when it sets I set.

Your letter, I need not say, was read with interest. You have my sincere thanks. You have been very frank with me of late; I will return you like for like. I will unclasp my soul to you, and you may read what I had hoped one day to have avowed proudly; or, that hope failing, to have buried it forever, — a dead hope in a dead heart.

You may recollect, on the evening which has given rise to this epistle, you made a guess as to what mine aspirations tended — you guessed poetry. I made some evasive answer. I could not then say "Ay." I can now say you guessed aright. It has been the seventh heaven of my aspirations for years; a passion running as deep as the aboriginal waters of my being. At the present moment the "passion poesy" standeth on the necks of all others like a king, and it will ultimately swallow them as the serpent of Moses swallowed the serpents of the Egyptian magicians. It is with a feeling of humiliation I make this confession. I know not how you will receive it. I trust, however, you will do me justice in your thoughts; that you will not place me in the category with the D—s, K—s, J—s. I believe my spirit is something different from theirs, — deeper and sincerer. I am unconscious of that pitiful vanity (the Alpha and Omega of their hopes) to see one's name in print, — the immortality of five minutes in the "poet's corner." Above all, don't laugh or sneer, however much you may pity. I could bear sneers on this point from no one, least of all from you. I might keep silent, but I would suffer like a martyr in his shirt of fire. Believe me it's no laughing matter. Underneath those wide doming heavens, that ancient sun, those pitying stars, of all the miseries this is the chiefest — when one has the soul, blood, heart, pulses of an angel — all but the wings! This is egotism with a vengeance, but we are all egotists; and all we are, feel, or see, — this universe of souls, stars and suns, is but a sublime egotism of Deity.

You tell me you wish I should yet fill a pulpit: this may never be. I speak in sober sadness when I say I am unfit for public life. That fire once burnt brightly on the hearthstone of my heart, — the flame flickered, waned, and died; a mighty wind scattered the red embers like autumn leaves; the hearthstone is now cold; I do not wish to fill a pulpit.

You may be inclined to ask, "What do you intend to do?" I might say, "Nothing." To attempt to become a preacher is useless: incapacity within — without difficulties no capacity could overcome — prevent it. What I would like is just some way of living which would feed and cover this carcase, and allow much time to roam through book-world, and the world of my own spirit, like the new-born Adam in the new-born Eden. You may say this life I desire to lead will not be a useful one for my fellows. Granted! I do not intend to gird on an apron and become waiter to the world.

If you judge me by the length of my letter you may think me rather ungrateful. I am at the confessional, and, certainly, the confession is no pleasant task. I do not know, however, that anything more need be said. I have unbosomed myself as well as I could. I fear this night's work will lessen your esteem for me, as I have fallen somewhat in my own in the course of it. If it so be, I will be the only loser. Jog along, Tom; the road of life is rough, but the eternities are ahead. We will reach them soon.

Yours truly,

A. SMITH.

Alexander Smith was born in Kilmarnock in 1830, and while in his boyhood was removed to Glasgow. His father was a designer, and such was the occupation to which Alexander was brought up. At a very early period of his history, however, literature seems to have won his allegiance; his tendencies in that direction being largely fostered by his becoming a member of a sort of small literary society which some lads had formed in Glasgow. Mr. Brisbane, having been himself a member, is rather proud of Smith's connection with the society, and claims for it the honor of having "produced" the poet. We have a suspicion, however, that men of Smith's ability and ambition manage to fight their way and find their level pretty much in defiance of conditions which may raise or lower men of less strength of will; and the inability of the Addisonian society to confer greatness on the other young men who, like Smith, had vague literary sympathies would seem to show that as a poet-producing machine its power was limited. The people who did help Alexander Smith were one or two critics who took up his poems, and did them a cruel kindness by praising them most injudiciously. This premature trumpeting forth of the arrival of a new poet only earned for Smith in after days the reaction of an unmerited neglect; and people who were quite unable to judge of any kind of poetry, and who did not perceive that his later works were infinitely superior to the crude and rhetorical "Life-Drama," were at least justified in saying that the "City Poems" and "Edwin of Deira" showed a falling away from the position which the poet on the authority of his first critics had gained.

Yet the "Life-Drama" contains some charming lyrics, many passages of noble description, and here and there a suggestive glimpse of character; while the later poems, more mature in conception and more finished and beautiful in execution, ought to have given Smith a front rank among our minor poets. Undeserved praise, however, was followed by undeserved neglect; and the poet, with now and then an impulsive effort in the old direction, subsided into an essayist. Here his poetic sympathies served him in good stead; and there are passages to be found in his prose-writings which it would be difficult to surpass in the range of English prose literature. Smith continued an essayist to the end—indeed, his very last effort, if we mistake not, was an unfinished essay for the London Review—and would seem to have given up all thought of sustained poetical labor. They who are curious about the details of his early career may find something to interest them in this little book, which, although it is the work of a friend, is written in an honest and impartial mood. We are not of opinion that the world has much to do with the private life of its poets, and painters, and authors; and we have often to lament the unwise fashion in which friends and relatives pander to a foolish curiosity, which delights in nothing so much as in learning the domestic habits, the peculiarities, and weaknesses, of its heroes. In the case of Alexander Smith there was nothing to conceal; he does not seem even to have been visited with those boyish follies which most biographers love to think characteristic of young genius. Mr. Brisbane writes in a kindly and temperate spirit, and does not make too much of his hero.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE King of Italy has been trying to build up his health in retirement at his hunting seat at San Rossore, near Pisa.

THE death of Lord Westminster places another Garter at the disposal of Mr. Gladstone. The honorable gentleman has a garter for each leg now.

TWO enormous blocks of marble have arrived in St. Petersburg, each weighing 72,000 pounds. They will form the pedestal to the statue of the Empress Catherine II.

VISCOUNT AMBERLEY who spent several months in this country a year or two since, is contributing to the Fortnightly Review a series of papers on "The Latter Day Saints."

A BALLET is in preparation in St. Petersburg, wherein the stage is to represent a piano-forte keyboard, on the keys of which, Lydia, the heroine of the ballet, is to go through her steps.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS is engaged on a new story. The work will come out in the old serial form,—the first part to appear in March. The title of the novel has not been announced.

DEJAZET, who holds her own almost as marvelously as Ninon de l'Enclos, is playing in l'ert-Vert at a Paris theatre. She performed in this play in 1814 before the allied sovereigns.

WESTLAND MARSTON has written a new play for Mr. Sothorn, to be produced at the Haymarket theatre on Christmas.

THE next number of the Fortnightly Review will contain a poem by Mr. Swinburne, in an entirely new measure. The poem will be entitled "The Complaint of Mona Lisa," and is from Boccaccio.

SIR WENTWORTH DILKE has become sole proprietor of the Athenæum, having bought out the interest of Mr. Holmes, the printer, who retires from the business, after nearly forty years' labor, with a handsome competency.

OFFENBACH has given place to Oliver Goldsmith at the St. James's Theatre, London, and the "Period" perpetrates the following clever epigram:—

"A Schneider's undress suits once held the place Where now a Goldsmith's ring has richer grace.
The law of fascination is more strict:
She stoops to Conquer now; before, she Kicked."

MR. WATTS PHILLIPS, the well-known dramatic writer, author of "The Marble Heart," and other pieces, which have obtained popularity on the stage, has appeared before the Court of Bankruptcy. He ascribes his failure to insufficiency of income to meet necessary expenditure.

MR. CHARLES DICKENS, it is said, will resume and conclude his farewell readings early in the new year. They will be twelve in number, but none of them will be given out of London. There will be two morning readings,—an arrangement made at the instance of several actors and actresses who have not the opportunity of spending an evening with "Boots at the Holly-tree Inn," or with Mr. Dick Swiveller.

THE duello is still prevalent in France. A fatal duel has just taken place between two officers of the 6th Hussars quartered at Castres. After the combat had lasted about twenty minutes, and Captain Cléménçon had received two slight wounds and Captain Baignol three, the seconds interfered. Captain Cléménçon, however, declared that the affair could only terminate with the death of himself or his adversary. Swords were again crossed, and after a few passes Captain Cléménçon was run through the heart.

THE Abbé Liszt is to pass several months at the Chateau of Szeged, in Hungary, the house of his friend Baron Anguss, where he will meet several European celebrities, amongst whom will be the painter Kaulback, the chemist Liebig, and Hans de Bulow. Naturally, music will bear a principal share in the amusements, and the four principal manufacturers of pianos in Germany have sent him their best instruments. During the winter he expects to finish the grand oratorio on which he has been engaged the whole of this year.

THE London Post observes that it may be said of Mr. Peabody, as Sir James Mackintosh said of Mr. Grattan, that he was one of the few private men whose private virtues are followed by public fame, and whose private virtues may be cited as examples for those who would follow in his public steps. In laying the foundation of wholesome and cheerful homes for the working classes he acted up to a high sense of duty, and touched the mainspring of civilization. He made his means the measure of his philanthropy, and in his whole life and conduct he displayed a purity of character that could not fail to elevate and refine the feelings which his generosity inspired.

THE question of premature burial continues to excite much interest in France. So many cases of persons being buried alive or only narrowly escaping that fate have occurred within the few last months, that several writers have begun an earnest crusade against the existing laws. M. Ramboson has just published a very elaborate treatise on the subject, and if the data he furnishes are correct there can be no doubt that the present obligatory interment twenty-four hours after officially pronounced decease involves a very serious risk of being buried alive. According to medical men who have made the subject their special study there is no infallible sign of death but incipient decomposition which does not necessarily manifest itself before the third day.

THE rise of the Neva has caused great alarm in St. Petersburg. At the last advices the Neva had already overflowed its banks, and guns were being fired to warn the tenants of ground-floors to remove themselves and their families to higher stories, or else to abandon the city. In the lower quarters the inhabitants were rapidly deserting. This is the first flood that has taken place at St. Petersburg for five-and-forty years. The last was in 1824, when 462 houses were destroyed, and 3,600 seriously damaged; 20,000 people were then left without shelter, and 600 were drowned. It is impossible to over-estimate the misery produced by catastrophes of this kind. In 1824 it was as though the whole city had gone into mourning. Festivities were everywhere suspended, and the money destined for the usual round of winter amusements all went to relieve the thousands of unhappy people whom the inundation had either thrown out of work or turned out of doors. To make matters worse, the cessation of balls and parties caused a stagnation in trade, and innumerable bankruptcies, so that to all classes the trial was a long and a cruel one.

"AZAMAT BATUK," an occasional correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, who writes very much like Matthew Arnold, has discovered an infant musical phenomenon. This is Azamat Batuk's account of it: "I was the other day in a newspaper shop, and heard somebody singing on the street an Italian and afterwards a German song quite uncommon in England, and with a correctness which struck me very much. On looking out I saw it was a boy of about twelve years of age sitting on the doorstep nursing two little children. On my inquiry about the boy, it appeared that the children he nursed belonged to some neighbor, and that he was himself but an errand-boy in a greengrocer's shop. Not wishing to create any illusion in the boy about his capacities, I preferred to speak to the mistress of the shop, and her answer was that 'He's always about that sort of thing'; that it is the kindest and the best boy she ever had, and that he belongs to a very poor family. I could not make myself a good idea of the compass of his voice, but its modulations and the correctness of his ear gave me the apprehension that there is an unusual artistic capacity in this boy. I am sorry that my means, as well as the circumstance of my being in a foreign land, do not permit my doing anything for this boy. But perhaps some of your readers will afford him an opportunity of developing what seems to be a considerable talent. The shop is 4 New Church Street, Alpha Road, N. W."

INTERCESSION.

"Ave Caesar Imperator, mortituum te salute."

I.

O DEATH, a little more, and then the worm;
A little longer, O Death, a little yet,
Before the grave gape and the grave-worm fret;
Before the sanguine-spotted hand infirm
Be rottenness, and that foul brain, the germ
Of all ill things and thoughts, be stopped and set;
A little while, O Death, ere he forget,
A small space more of life, a little term;
A little longer ere he and thou be met,
Ere in that hand that fed thee to thy mind
The poison-cup of life be overset;
A little respite of disastrous breath,
Till the soul lift up her lost eyes, and find Nor God nor help nor hope, but thee, O Death.

II.

Shall a man die before his dying day,
Death? and for him though the utter day be nigh,
Not yet, not yet we give him leave to die;
We give him grace not yet that men should say
He is dead, wiped out, perished and past away.
Till the last bitterness of life go by,
Thou shalt not slay him; till those last dregs run dry,
O thou last lord of life! thou shalt not slay.
Let the lips live a little while and lie,
The hand a little, and falter, and fail of strength,
And the soul shudder and sicken at the sky;
Yea, let him live, though God nor man would let Save for the curse's sake; then at bitter length,
Lord, will we yield him to thee, but not yet.

III.

Hath he not deeds to do and days to see
Yet ere the day that is to see him dead?
Beats there no brain yet in the poisonous head,
Throbs there no treason? if no such thing there be,
If no such thought, surely this is not he.
Look to the hands then; are the hands not red?
What are the shadows about this man's bed?
Death, was not this the cup-bearer to thee?
Nay, let him live then, till in this life's stead
Even he shall pray for that thou hast to give;
Till seeing his hopes and not his memories fled
Even he shall cry upon thee a bitter cry,
That life is worse than death; then let him live,
Till death seem worse than life; then let him die.

IV.

O watcher at the guardless gate of kings,
O doorkeeper that serving at their feast Hast in thine hand their doomsday drink, and seest
With eyeless sight the soul of unseen things;
Thou in whose ear the dumb time coming sings, Death, priest and king that makest of king and priest
A name, a dream, a less thing than the least,
Hover awhile above him with closed wings,
Till the coiled soul, an evil snake-shaped beast,
Eat its base bodily lair of flesh away;
If haply, or ever its cursed life have ceased,
Or ever thy cold hands cover his head
From sight of France and freedom and broad
day,
He may see these and wither and be dead.

THE DEATH PENALTY.

A NARRATIVE.

By JULES SIMON.

[Translated from the French by Mr. W. H. HUNTINGTON for EVERY SATURDAY.]

PART THIRD.

V.

ALL these details pained me inexpressibly. The king's prosecutor had sent to Kerdroguen for a boy, who, you would have said, was twelve or thirteen years, whose business was to take the grain to the mill and the flour to customers. It turned that this child was twenty years old and was on the point of drawing in the conscription. He was a respectable witness. He knew the Nays, to whom he had often lent his horse, when returning without a load, and when they had made a long distance on foot, for it was five good leagues from Saint Allouestre to Bignan. At the outset of the examination he tried to feign ignorance, and pretended that he was not acquainted with any of the brothers; but in this attempt he broke down, for it was proved to him, as clear as day, that he knew them all three perfectly well. As was proper, he was threatened with punishment for false testimony. Alarmed at this, he distinctly avowed that the three had eaten supper in his master's house the evening of the crime, that each of them had a gun, that they went away with the band to go to the mayor's, that he had even accompanied them a part of the way, but that at the entrance of the burg, he had been ordered back, and that stones were thrown at him to force him to return the quicker to the mill.

This deposition was the more overwhelming that it had been made unwillingly; so that the presence of the prisoners with arms at the place of the crime was positively proved. It could not indeed be demonstrated that they had themselves laid violent hands on the unhappy Brossard, and we were all fully persuaded that their only complicity in the assassination was their presence at it; but what could their advocate do? acquittal was impossible and condemnation could only be condemnation to death or to hard labor for life.

When I called upon M. Jourdan, who had charge of the defence, I found him very much discouraged. "They claim to be innocent," he said to me; "they declare that they were carried by force into the chamber of the victim, and that they struggled with the assassins; but it is a weak defence, which I hardly dare to put forward. Before having seen them, I thought myself able to establish an alibi; I counted on their youth, on their previous good conduct; but their statement renders me powerless. It is evident that they are guilty, and I shall not be able to prevent conviction."

All my efforts to gain admission to the jail were futile. It had been foreseen that the scholars would beg to see their comrades, and orders had been issued to refuse all permission. I acknowledge that my soul was distracted.

This giant crime so near me appalled me. I asked myself if one could feel sure of one's self after having witnessed a transformation so complete and deplorable. Sometimes I tried to convince myself that political fanaticism was an excuse; but my conscience spoke immediately, and so forcibly, that I blushed to have hesitated. I felt painfully affected between shame, horror, and the remains of pity. It was in vain that I endeavored to resume my studies; my spirit was weighed down by this unhappy trial; I dreamed of it day and night. Even when I could have been able to forget it, I had near me a spectacle which recalled it incessantly, — the Nayl family.

I saw them daily. They had only me to visit them, — would I could say to console them!

Towards six in the evening I was freed from the occupations of the day, and used to go immediately to their inn. I remember that I always hastened my steps on the way thither, in the hope of learning something new, and that, having reached the foot of the stairs, I stopped there sometimes a quarter of an hour, without daring to go up. I was sure of finding them all there; for they went out but for an hour every day to go to the jail. The father was always standing by the window; the mother sat weeping on a stool by the fireplace. For the daughter-in-law, I can never express the respect and admiration with which she inspired me. She was no heroine of romance, far from it; she had a plain face, and coarse hands accustomed to field labor and washing and hemp stripping. She wore the ugly costume of the women of Saint Allouestre and Saint Jean Brévelay, a long stiff head-dress of starched linen that falls half-way to the waist, and a cloth petticoat. Her mind matched her person, not too acute nor too gross. I suppose she was intelligent enough to manage a common farm-house and govern one or two female servants. But what was noble in her was her self-devotion and her courage. After the first days given up to wailing, she came to understand that these two old folks were falling to her charge, for the blow that God had let them be stricken with, had almost destroyed their minds.

Forthwith she dried her eyes and set herself to work to nourish, comfort, and care for them, like a good mother. It was plain at first sight, on entering this sad abode, that she alone still really lived; the other two might have been mere corpses but for the torture of their poignant grief. While working without relaxation,—sweeping, washing, cooking,—she ever had an eye to her poor old-wards. Now she brought his pipe ready filled to her father; now when passing by her mother, she threw her arms about her neck and printed a warm kiss on her lips. If M. Jourdan came,—and he always made haste to come whenever he caught a gleam of hope,—Marion heard him mounting the winding stairs, and went to meet him. She indicated what words he must use to keep up a little hope in those two hearts,—not enough to deceive them, but enough to help out their lives a few more days. She did not cheat herself; she felt that she was mortally wounded; but she acted like those captains who call up all their strength to order the last charge with a firm voice, ready to drop dead when the start is once given. But where she was particularly admirable, was in her conviction of the innocence of her husband and of his two brothers. "They did not do it, I tell you. What I wonder at is that they did not let themselves be killed to save him; but you may be sure they were held back by force. I know my husband; I know the two brothers. I hold up my hand before God for them!" Her voice and accent, when she spoke in this way, went to the soul. Sometimes the old man would say, but hesitatingly for his heart and his misery belied his doctrine; "They did right—" Then she put her hand on his mouth. "Silence, father," she would say to him; "does not a wife know her husband? He never did any such thing, so sure as I hope for Paradise." And then going up to her mother: "Come, mother, you tell him so; do justice to your own blood. They will make martyrs of them perhaps,"—and here a sob interrupted her words,— "but it is that day will see a crime committed." One day, when I was present at one of these scenes, she perceived that I was weeping.

"But tell him so then, you too!" she cried out, grasping my hand with convulsive force; "you, their friend, who have lived with them; you, who have prayed to the good God with them, tell him that they are innocent!"

"Yes!" I exclaimed, for her faith took possession of me; and while looking at her, I found again in my thoughts my poor friends such as I had known them,—so pure, and simple, and good, and far removed from anything like fanaticism,— "yes, I believe it,—believe it as you do!"

"Now God be praised!" the poor woman cried out; "now you see yourself, father," and she pushed me towards him. But the old man turned away, perhaps to hide his tears. I went out from there, my head on fire, my blood all burning.

There was a calvary hard by, at the door of the Church du Mené. I threw myself on my knees before it, without heed to the passers-by. The world was indifferent to me in such suffering. I heard them say, "That is a friend of the prisoners"; but no mockery went with the words. They are a good people; they had rather wept with me if they had dared.

VI.

When the day for the trial came I promised myself to be in the front rank of the spectators, so that the eyes of the accused could rest on me. Guymar was to hold himself in readiness to run to the father on the slightest occasion. Abbé Le Ber, who, notwithstanding the difference of age, was a friend for us, had been engaged, without great difficulty, to walk up and down before the seminary during the day, waiting to accompany Guymar, if, as was too much to be feared, there should be bad news to tell.

We were at the 17th December. Snow had fallen through the night, and over the snow was frozen sleet. The trial was to begin at nine o'clock; at eight o'clock I knocked at the door of the family. "Come in, we are ready," said the voice of Marion. I found them all dressed and prepared to go out.

"This is tempting Providence," I protested, "to take the mother there."

The remark evoked no word of reply. The father solemnly crossed himself, and went in advance, the two women followed, sustaining each other. After having descended two steps, Marion ran hastily back, and returned with a chaplet that hung on the wall, which she placed in the hand of the old mother. It was idle to resist; I followed them.

The court-room was crammed, and there was a throng about the door; but way was made for us, and we reached the bar that separates the public from the space reserved for the court. The king's prosecutor was already in his place. He turned pale at seeing us, and, calling to M. Jourdan, whispered him something.

"I am quite agreed with you," replied M. Jourdan aloud; "but neither your authority nor my request would have the slightest effect."

The features of the prosecutor expressed a painful resignation; and I am sure he thought at that moment that never before had duty been so stern for him. Shortly after he had chairs brought, that the women might be seated. I felt them tremble and shudder by the side of me. The judges were now announced, and almost at the same time the accused were brought in.

VII.

I do not undertake to explain how it is that those two long hearings have left nothing but a most confused impression on my memory, while I can recall in their least details all the other incidents of this sorrowful story. Firmly persuaded that an acquittal was impossible, and preferring for my friends the scaffold to the galleys, I attended there as if at the beginning of a long torture rather than at a legal trial.

The poor boys had grown pale and haggard with anxiety and captivity. They came in, however, with a firm enough step; but when they saw those two women and the old father two paces from their bench, their courage forsook them. Jean Louis was near enough to reach his hand to his wife, who covered it with tears and kisses. After that he turned his face to the court, and I saw clearly that none of them meant to look again on our side.

I paid no attention to the reading of the indictment, which could only rehearse facts unhappily too well known; but M. Jourdan whispered me that it was drawn up with dangerous ability, and that the jury was unfavorably disposed. I observed indeed, that during the reading of this document, which was very long, the impressions of the audience seemed to grow more and more hostile. It was entirely composed of inhabitants of the town, for whom a chouan was an enemy, and who, having for a year and more heard nothing talked of but violent robberies, assassinations, fires, and lawless gangs roving through the country, were animated with the common desire of seeing these disorders put an end to by a severe repression. The sentiment of pity excited by the family of the accused as they entered the hall was soon forgotten in listening to the moving details of the death of M. Brossard. The king's attorney had felt it his duty to introduce into the indictment everything that told to the honor of the victim; he was manifestly a worthy, open-handed, loyal man, and could be justly entitled the benefactor of his commune. In denouncing the refractories he had but fulfilled the strict duty of his office. Was it not also the duty of every good citizen to combat a rebellion so disastrous to the district, and which, under a political disguise, was, in reality, mere brigandage? M. Brossard had pushed moderation to its last limits, since he had allowed the guilty parties a given time within which to quit the country. Nay, it was more than moderation, it was indulgent weakness. And yet they had gone to surprise him in his sleep; they had, so to speak, hacked him in pieces; for the indictment gave the number of the wounds, and the hearers shuddered at the recital of the ferocity of the murderers. They recalled with horror that knife nailing a proclamation to the dead man's breast, and asked each other what bounds the assassins would set to their audacity.

The examination was listened to with manifest signs of ill-will. Jean Louis, the eldest, who answered first, distinctly affirmed that he had taken no part in the murder; that he had even done his utmost to prevent it, but that he had been held fast, he and his brothers, in a corner of the chamber, while the crime was consummated. The judge president noted the extreme improbability of such allegation.

"Why, if they were opposed to the assassination, did they accompany the assassins. — They were forced to do so. — For what purpose? — Impossible to explain. — But when men go on an expedition of this nature, they do not take persons with them purely for the sake of securing testimony afterwards against themselves?" To this the accused made no reply. "You are all three vigorous; Brossard was a man of unusual strength. If you had struggled, you might at least have served to give the alarm. A murder in the centre of a village is impossible, even by numbers, in presence of three resolute men." No answer.

When the turn of the youngest brother came, and he was asked why, instead of joining his regiment, he threw himself into the band of the refractories, he showed confusion and made no reply.

"Was it your father who advised you to this course?"

"I did as the others did," he answered; "but as for the murder neither I nor my brothers were engaged in it; we would have suffered death to prevent it —"

"Silence!" said the president, sharply; "let us at least have no hypocrisy."

Several witnesses were heard, to prove that the brothers Nayl had been for a week with the refractories of the canton of Saint Jean Brévelay; that they accompanied the band to Kerdroguen and supped at the miller's; and that, finally, they entered with the others the house of the mayor.

These depositions, bearing on known and avowed facts, offered no interest. Neighbors testified that they had heard no noise, which proved that there had been no struggle. From the house situated opposite that of M. Brossard, the light had been seen in his chamber and the shadows of a number of persons; but this had excited no attention, it being natural that he should be in conference that night with the soldiers and gendarmes.

The deposition of the doctor was a terrible one. He stated that, according to all appearances, Brossard had been seized and tightly held by the legs and arms, and had thus been killed without the possibility of an attempt to defend himself. He had received eighteen strokes with a knife, of which the wounds were horrible. The assassins had continued to wreak their fury on the corpse, for he must have died from the first blows.

These details produced such an effect that the court rising, after a fatiguing session, immediately on the close of the doctor's deposition, the judge president deemed it prudent to take measures for preventing the escort of the prisoners from traversing the groups of excited people. In the courtroom next morning the emotion of the crowd was not yet allayed; and they were rehearsing aloud one to another, awaiting the entrance of the judges, this and that particular of the doctor's testimony.

There only remained to be heard the witnesses for the defence and the pleadings. M. Jourdan had passed several hours with the accused after the yesterday's session, and the energy of their protestations had finally triumphed over his doubts. But in telling me this, he added, despondingly, that all minds were made up, and that the pressing work now was to make the family accept the idea of a petition for mercy.

The principal witness for the defence was the venerable curé of Saint Allouestre, an old man of seventy-six years, who moved the audience for a moment by the earnestness of his protestations.

"Do you believe them capable of a bad action?" asked M. Jourdan, — "capable of a murder?"

But when the witness had answered these questions, the king's prosecutor inquired of him what were the opinions of the family? Was not the father of the accused the same Nayl who, in 1802, along with Sapinaud and the Abbé Moisan, succeeded in landing on the coast by Saint Gildas ten thousand muskets sent from England? Had he not kept for thirty years, hung up in his house by the side of the crucifix, the sword of a captain of volunteers, whom he had slain with his own hand? Might not such a man, after having urged his sons to join the refractories, suggest to them the idea of the murder? Nay, had the curé himself nothing to reproach himself with? Since the Revolution, the Domine Salvum had not been chanted in the parish of Saint Allouestre. Not one of its young conscripts for the last two years had joined his regiment. The bishop had written him on the subject. And what was his response to his ecclesiastical chief, his spiritual father? "I cannot condemn a course of conduct which I should have pursued at their age. I cannot recommend the taking of an oath, which I would not take, if it were required of me." The king's attorney had the letter there among his papers, and read from the very manuscript. The curé had carried his fanaticism to the length of preaching insurrection in hardly veiled terms. Had he not, one Sunday after sermon, recited aloud, on the steps of the altar, a Pater and an Ave Maria for "our brave young men"? No one doubted as to the application—

M. Jourdan endeavored to interfere between his witness and the prosecutor, but the latter held fast to the curé, sternly admonishing him of his duties and of the responsibility he was incurring.

The examination of witnesses was over. Before formally pronouncing its termination, the judge president addressed the three brothers, reminding them that no testimony had been given in support of the incredible assumption on which they rested their defence.

"I repeat to you," he added, "what has been set forth in the indictment: If it be true that you are the victims of the assassins and not their accomplices, they are your most cruel enemies, and you owe them no consideration. It is easy for you to put justice on their track. They alone are your exculpatory witnesses; there can be no others. Your obstinate refusal to denounce them will be brought against you as an enhancing proof that you have nothing to look for from their testimony. Jean Louis," he said, addressing himself to the eldest of the brothers, "you have a young wife whom you love. I point out to you the sole means of saving yourself—"

Marion had started up convulsively at hearing herself named. Her husband also rose. His face grew red and then all pale. He opened his lips as if he would speak, but uttered no word. His two brothers had half risen, turning their faces towards him. He gazed on Marion, who looked like a corpse; but she said in an undertone, yet so as to be heard by the judges on the bench, "Die rather!"

Her husband turned towards the court and spoke with a firm voice: "I have nothing to say; I am innocent!"

The pleadings could not be long. The jury gave but a few moments to deliberation; and the court presently pronounced its decree, sentencing the three men to the penalty of death. I had exhausted myself in fruitless efforts to lead away the parents. The president himself had sent an official of the tribunal to beseech them to withdraw; but they remained till the end. To see them at that last moment, you would have said their minds were wandering.

THE OLDEST HUMAN REMAINS IN EUROPE.

BY P. MARTIN DUNCAN, SECRETARY OF THE GEOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

THE questions of the origin and primitive condition of the human race, are gradually assuming such great importance, that it is absolutely necessary to reconsider the value of the evidence which has been published in support of the high antiquity of certain portions of the skeletons of men found in sediments. Not many years since it was a favorite dogma that human bones could not be preserved for any long period without decomposition taking place, and that they were therefore not liable to become fossilized. But year after year there has appeared some evidence in opposition to this theory, and now there are many specimens of human bones which have been dug up from sediments whose positions indicate a very considerable antiquity. Some of the specimens were obtained during the careful and scientific excavation of caverns by qualified geologists, and others were discovered under less satisfactory circumstances. There has been great doubt expressed about the discovery of some of the human remains, and much suspicion exists about others. Their extreme rarity, and the facilities for deception, have been advanced as arguments against the fact of any human bones having been really found in positions where they must have remained undisturbed during great changes in the physical geography of the neighborhood. Moreover, the indisposition to concede a high antiquity to man has tended to the rejection of trustworthy evidence to the contrary.

There has always been a great disinclination to associate man with the extinct mammalia. He was supposed to belong essentially to the existing state of things. Moreover, there has been a strong objection to the possibility of great physico-geographical changes having occurred during the human period. But now that paleontology and natural history have combined to prove the vast antiquity of many existing species of animals, there is no reason, if the book of nature is alone studied, why man should not have a corresponding age. The antiquity is of course measured by certain geological changes in continents, and alterations in the relative positions of sediments, rivers, and seas.

Opinions overcame many facts in the early part of this century, and every discovery of human remains in association with the extinct fauna was discredited. It had occurred over and over again that huge reptilian bones, or those of the mammoth and whale, had been ignorantly decided to be those of giants. These mistakes, coupled with the dogma about the impossibility of the preservation of human bones, affected the judgment of some very distinguished men. Of late years the speculations of some biologists respecting the simian characteristics of certain portions of the human crania that were found in very old deposits, have made the subject of the antiquity of man very distasteful and unpopular. But from an early date in this century, well authenticated instances of the discovery of human bones in association with the remains of the extinct fauna have been carefully detailed in many first-class scientific journals. The late Dr. Buckland, although an enthusiastic geologist, appears to have been influenced by the opinions concerning the impossibility of the preservation of human bones in deposits for any very long period. Those who are acquainted with the general characteristics of very early burials, and who have read Lartet's description of the caves in the valley of the Vézère, must be struck by Buckland's very off-hand determination of the age of the so-called red lady of the Paviland.

During some excavations in the Goat's Hole Cave, fifteen miles west of Swansea, Dr. Buckland came upon traces of human remains in close contiguity with the skull of a mammoth. The left side of a human skeleton was found surrounded by red earth and stained of the same color; it had some small ivory rods close to it and some common shells of the sea-shore also. Six inches of earth covered the skeleton, which was in the same kind of soil and on the same level with the head of the mammoth. This huge cranium was covered with a much greater depth of soil, but was further from the opening of the cave than the human remains. Dr. Buckland pronounced these to be, comparatively speaking, modern as regards the date of their sepulture, and to have no relation to the mammoth's head as regards their deposition. He was of opinion that the bone earth of the cave had often been disturbed by excavators, and that the skeleton was that of a woman who had died long after the sediment had been deposited. Dr. Falconer took Dr. Buckland's view of the age of the red lady, and drew attention to the similarity of the ivory rods to those which were common on both sides of the English Channel in prehistoric times. Since Dr. Buckland described the cave many have visited it, and there is one important fact upon which all are agreed, and that is that flint instruments of palæolithic age were found on the surface of the remains of the bone earth. The force of the expression that repeated excavations have been made in the cave, is lost when there are such proofs of the antiquity of the bone earth. No one was likely to bury anything there of late years, for the cave is very difficult of access. That the red lady was buried, there can be little doubt, but it is evident, from the nature of the surrounding deposits, and the character of the funeral accessories, that this took place in palæolithic times. The skeleton, or rather what remains of it, is not, however, that of a woman, but of a tall male. It is worthy of the attention of anatomists, and is very interesting to antiquaries, for it is the only considerable portion of the human frame found in Great Britain in association with the extinct mammalia.

Aimé Boue, a German geologist of excellent reputation, found some human bones at Lahr under that silt of the Old Rhine which is called the loess. The discovery was neglected, and the matter dropped. Nevertheless, the details of the excellent observer were recorded, and have lately been substantiated by a corresponding discovery at Eguisheim, near Colmar. Aimé Boue had not a class of readers that would accept the inferences which must be drawn, respecting time, from the consideration of the position of the remains beneath the loess; and probably there were not half a dozen men in the world that could make up their minds about the age of this deposit. This question will be carefully considered further on.

About this time a human jaw was found near Maestricht, at a depth of nineteen feet from the surface, in a stratum of sandy loam which rested upon gravel.

After Aimé Boue's discovery, the remains of man associated with those of the reindeer, in clay, were found by M. Tournai, in a cave at Bize, near Narbonne. This able anatomist and antiquary grasped the importance of the discovery, and he made the first attempt at a classification of post-tertiary geology. He established a human period, — Anthropoienne, — and divided it into ante-historic and historic sub-periods. This was in 1828.

In 1833, Schmerling published his "Recherches sur les ossemens Fossiles découvertes dans les Cavernes de la Province de Liège." He described the details of his discovery of the human skull at Engis, and sent the specimen to Paris. The cave in which it was found had been opened under the personal superintendence of Schmerling. The remains were discovered at a depth of a metre and a half underneath an osseous brecchia formed of the remains of small animals and which contained the tooth of rhinoceros and some of those of the horse, and of ruminants. Remains of rhinoceros, horse hyæna, and bear, surrounded the skull on every side (de toute part). Moreover, from another observation of Schmerling's, it is evident that the mammoth was associated with the human remains, which he says were entourés de ceux d'éléphant de rhinoceros, et des carnassiers.

The great Parisian anatomists were as unprepared for the discovery of the association of human remains with those of the extinct mammalia as their fellow-savans. Schmerling's labors were discredited, and the great age of the Engis skull was denied, because it presented the closest resemblance to many ordinary and modern crania. It was supposed by the advocates of the progressive development theory, that some alteration in the contour and shape of the bones of the head must have occurred in man during the vast ages that must have elapsed since the mammoth died out in Europe. The Engis skull was too human, and therefore the voice of authority was not heard in its favor. Schmerling was, however, a first-class comparative osteologist, and his work was so carefully compiled from his own notes that it could not be forgotten. He described the different kinds of gravels and clays in which the animal and human remains were found, and divided them into two series. He did not see the geological value of his divisions, for the science was still in the midst of its struggle to get out of the hands of the cataclysmatists. But he distinctly noticed one gravel which was at the bottom of the caves, and whose stones were not of the rock of the neighborhood, and a second gravel and clay, whose angular masses were composed of the limestone out of which the rivers and caves were worn or excavated. He noticed that some very ossiferous earth exactly resembled the soil which caps the top of the hills of the neighborhood. Thirty years elapsed, and Dupont began to describe the caverns of the Lesse, close to the seat of Schmerling's labor. The science of geology had greatly increased in the mean time, and the effects of fluvial erosion, and the phenomena of making and moving gravel had been particularly studied. If any evidence were required to prove the correctness of Schmerling's work, it has been offered over and over again by Dupont, whose classification of the sediments containing the osseous remains in the caves is simply an extension of the ideas of the great Belgian anatomist.

The soil that capped the hills around Liège, and which Schmerling noticed to be ossiferous, is an extension of that loess under which Aimé Boue had discovered human remains. But this geological fact was not satisfactorily determined when the Neanderthal skull and bones were discovered. Dupont's researches had not shown geologists clearly what the loess was, and, indeed, he had not written on the subject. His elaborate investigations, which form the only satisfactory groundwork for the study of the antiquity of man in relation to geology, were not before the world when the skull and bones just mentioned were found in a fissure leading from the plateau above the valley of the Neander down into the ravine. The fissure communicated with the cliff face of the valley at whose base flowed the river, and its upper outlet was on the surface of the country, all of which is more or less covered by the loess. This loess filled the fissure, and in it were the bones. The skull was peculiar in shape, and it attracted great attention. Its position in the great deposit of silt or loess which covered the country around the Rhine and its branches and extended far to the east, and which had been worn down by the great river and its affluents until it formed here and there cliffs hundreds of feet in height, indicated extraordinary changes in the physical geography of Europe during and after the time of the early men. Aimé Boué's discovery was not considered, Schmerling was still comparatively unread. The shape of the bones appeared to cause distinguished savans to run riot, and the Neanderthal skull became one of the wonders of the age. Yet, if there could be no doubt thrown upon the deposition of the skull in original and unmoved loess, there is now abundance of evidence to show that its antiquity is greatly inferior to the Engis skull, and to those human remains found by Dupont in some of the caves in the valley of the Lesse. Such remains, for instance, as the lower jaw, found in the cave of La Naulette, and the bones and skulls discovered in the caverns named Du Frontal and La Rosette. But there is every reason for believing that the fissure in the Neanderthal rock was not filled during the deposition of the loess, and that the upper opening and the cavity was closed at that time. If this theory is correct the loess may have drifted down the fissure at any time between its deposition and the historic period or afterwards. The body whose bones were found in the midst of the silt in the fissure may have been washed down, or its possessor may have fallen down during the in-wash of the sediment. The excavation of the valley close by does not appear to be necessarily associated with the deposition of the loess in the fissure. The Neanderthal skull cannot, therefore, be considered of any value as a type of great antiquity. It should be placed after the human remains found by Aimé Boué at Lahr, and by Faudel at Eguisheim in the chronology of man.

M. Faudel has described the position of the human frontal and parietal bones that were found close to the hill called Bühl at Eguisheim near Colmar. ("Ann. des Sciences Nat." v. serie, tom. vi. p. 361.) There is a cliff formed of an old sandstone deposit, close to Eguisheim, and the hill of Bühl is a slight elevation which rests against it. The hill slopes off into a plain which extends towards Colmar. The under part of the hill is formed by a tertiary limestone, which dips towards the plain at an angle of from fifteen to twenty degrees. The upper part is formed of the loess or upper silt of the second glacial extension, and it is thick on the flanks, but thin on the top of the hill. At the base of the hill some of the old Alpine gravel of the first extension of the glaciers is found, and it is covered by the loess just mentioned to the extent of two or three metres. Some bones of the stag were found in sinking cellars in the loess in 1865, and shortly afterwards the human remains were exhumed. Some elephantine remains were found in the old gravel, but none were discovered in the true silty loess. The human remains were found in the silty loess, and consisted of a frontal and parietal bone; they were separated, but could be united easily. The loess contained the usual shells of the deposit. Helix hispida, Lin.; Pupa muscorum, Drap.; Succinea oblonga, Drap.

The jaw discovered by Crahey, of Louvain, and which is known as the Maestricht jaw, was found above the old Alpine gravel and in the lowest part of the loess. The old gravel had been much disturbed and its elephantine fossils had been ploughed up by the torrents that accompanied the formation of the lowest part of the silty loess, consequently there is a great mixture of the faunas of the deposit. The jaw may be fairly considered to be of the same geological age as the remains at Lahr and Eguisheim.

The antiquity of the human remains found in France in the gravels of the Somme and Seine, in the Grotto des Feés, in the caves of Perigord, and in those of the southeastern part of the country has been the subject of much discussion. Many of the French anthropologists hold to their original opinion that the lower jaw-bone discovered in the gravel at Abbeville was not introduced there a short time previously to the visit of the "finder," and that it was deposited with the sediment that surrounded it. They assert that other bones were found there subsequently. A careful examination of the evidence that has been published concerning the Abbeville jaw proves that there is much reason for doubting its antiquity, and when the collateral proof of the successful and abortive attempts at deception respecting many of the flint implements said to have been found in the same gravel as the jaw are considered, there is nothing left but to put the mandible on one side as an untrustworthy piece of humanity. The lower jaw discovered in the Grotto des Feés was associated with the remains of the extinct mammalia, and a careful examination of the evidence leads to the belief that although the cave had often been disturbed, the bone was not introduced artificially, but was washed in with the remains of mammoth, rhinoceros, and bear. The fact of the cave having been frequented for years before its excavation renders the artificial introduction of the bone possible, and although such a proceeding was most improbable, the value of the relic to the anatomist and to the student of early man is seriously affected.

M. Reboux found human bones in the gravels of the Seine, and they are known as the Clichy-Montmartre remains. There can be no doubt about their having been found where they are stated to have been met with, but their age is not satisfactorily determined. Considering the evidence brought forward, these bones may be associated with those of the palæolithic age, but not with those of the age of the mammoth.

The skeletons found in the cave at Cro-Magnon, in the valley of the Vézère in Perigord, may be taken as the types, as regards age, of the osseous remains discovered in Southwestern and Southern France, associated with the antiquities of the reindeer period. Bruniquel, Bize, and other caves have yielded portions of human skeletons, but the admirable condition and the extraordinary development of the Cro-Magnon skulls, femora, and tibiae, offer such opportunities for study and comparison that they necessarily have attracted the greatest attention. The Cro-Magnon skeletons were found on the top of the remains of a shelter or cave, which was nearly filled. They belonged to individuals who had been buried, and one had certainly died a violent death. There were no antiquities found above them, and beneath were the relics of the reindeer age. There were several old hearths in the cave, one over the other; they were formed of charcoal, charred bones and ashes, and they were separated by masses of limestone which had fallen time after time from the roof. In the lowest of the hearths was part of the tusk of a mammoth. The age of these skeletons cannot be decided by means of any geological data, and it can only be estimated in a very comparative and unsatisfactory manner by considering the antiquities of the other caves of the valley. The discoverer of the bones, M. Lartet, and their describer, M. P. Broca, consider them to belong to the age of the mammoth. To this opinion I cannot defer, and I would rather give them the age of the reindeer in M. Lartet's classification of prehistoric archæology.

In Northern Italy there is a great difficulty in deciding the exact relation of some very old bones to the Alpine silt or loess, which, like that of the rivers to the Alps, covers much of the country.

There is an old and a new Alpine gravel and silt, south of the Alps, just as there is to the north; and the position of the skull discovered at Olmo in these sediments is unsatisfactorily determined. The older sediment consists of the down-wash of the great moraines and glacier mud that followed the retreat of the glaciers when the so-called glacial period of Europe and the north ceased. This sediment, the first Alpine gravel, contains the remains of the great mammalia. The younger silt is the product of the second glacialization of the Alps. It is the wash-down of the moraine mud of the glaciers which extended far into the Italian plains during the period when the great mammalia became comparatively extinct, and the Arctic animals typified by the reindeer, musk sheep, and glutton roamed through Western Europe. This second Alpine gravel may have been formed or rather spread over the plains at any period between the end of the second glacial period and the departure of the Arctic animals from amongst the Western European fauna. Consequently bones covered by it have not the same geological value as those found amongst the older or first gravel. M. Cocchi's description of the discovery leads to the belief that the Olmo skull is like that of the Neanderthal, very likely very old and perhaps comparatively modern. It is reasonable, however, to give a palæolithic date to the Olmo skull.

The age of the human bones discovered by M. Dupont has now to be considered, and it will be observed that by bringing these remains in careful association with the geology of Belgium, a classification of the antiquity of all the human remains noticed can be founded upon very satisfactory reasoning. Europe, north and south of the Alps, in the Alps, and to their east and west, and in and about the Pyrenees, has experienced some grand changes in its physical geography since man first appeared on the western area. The geological phenomena that prove this, show a relative contemporaneity as regards the conditions in the Alps, Pyrenees, Vosges, and Ardennes. There are evidences of two great extensions of the glaciers, and of the former presence of coast-lines now either worn away or submerged. What the phenomena of life were on the continent of Europe when the glacial conditions extended to the Thames, when icebergs grounded in the Channel, and when glaciers, hundreds of miles long, descended from the mountainous districts of Europe, no one can imagine. But it is evident that this glacialization was terminated by a general and very gradual upheaval of the whole of Europe. With increased warmth came huge rivers that spread their gravels and cut their way down as the land rose. These gravels were not formed from the rock subjacent to them, but of materials from a distance. Such a gravel formed of crystalline and gneissic rocks covers much of the elevated land of Belgium, near Liège and Dinant. It is known as the Ardennes gravel; it is water-worn and round. It was washed down from the Vosges and Ardennes as their glaciers retreated, and as that part of Belgium became upheaved. This gravel is the geological equivalent of the old Alpine gravel of the Rhine, and of the first gravel of the Italians plains. As the Belgian plains arose they were cut into by the streams, and this gravel was washed down them, and into their caves. At last a period of rest came, and the deep and narrow valleys of the Lesse were still carrying down the mud and stone of the Ardennes gravel. This was the age of the great mammalia, and it is in the mud and gravels of this period that the jaw of the Naulette Cave was found and the Engis skull discovered. The high level gravels of England and of the Somme Valley belong to the earliest part of this period during which Europe was inhabited by not less than four species of elephants.

A gradual depression of the European area succeeded the period of rest. The second extension of the glaciers occurred, and the greater part of the pachyderms and many carnivora became extinct. Again a period of upheaval commenced, and the Belgian valleys were choked up with their own wear and tear,—not with the Ardennes gravel which was covered with it. As the land rose and the glaciers retreated, vast floods brought down the moraine and glacial mud, and, finding the outlets choked, deposited their silt or loess to the thickness of hundreds of feet. Still the continent arose, and the Rhine began to cut its way through the loess, and the Belgian valleys were nearly emptied of their contents.

This second gravel of the valley is angular, and consists of the minerals of the carboniferous limestone of their sides. It is covered here and there by the fine silt or loess, and both sediments were formed about the same time. The angular gravel is the lowest member of the loess, and the silt the upper. It is beneath and amongst this upper member that the Neanderthal, the Eguisheim, the Lahr, and the Maestricht remains were found, and thus their remote antiquity disappears.

Amongst the gravel and the silt are found the remains of the reindeer. There were caves which were open after the deposit of the Ardennes gravel, and within them human remains were buried. These have subsequently been covered up with the angular gravel before it was washed out of the valleys. Such skeletons as those of the caves Du Frontal, Chaleux, and La Rosette are covered with the angular gravel. Consequently their age dates before the filling up of the valleys with the second gravel. The great mammalia had ceased to be prominent members of the fauna when the sepulture of the cave Du Frontal was closed with a dalle. The time that may have elapsed between the sepulture and the filling up of the valleys may have been as great as that which it took to clear them out again and to re-elevate the country. It leads one back far before the formation of the loess, and yet the reindeer was the most prominent member of the fauna.

The results of M. Dupont's studies show that palæolithic man lived during the excavation of the valleys and the filling of the caves more or less with Ardennes gravel. The jaw of La Naulette and the Engis skull are the Belgian human remains of this period. The jaw of the Grotto des Fécés is also of this age. These are the only examples of human bones that will bear criticism, and which can be referred to the mammoth age. M. Dupont proves that after the excavation of the Belgian valleys, and the deposition of the Ardennes gravel within their caves, men were buried in the cave Du Frontal and included in the sediments at Chaleux and in the cave of La Rosette. No traces of the mammoth (except at Chaleux, where a huge bone was found not belonging to a contemporaneous elephant) were discovered with these remains which belong to the reindeer period. After the sepulture at the cave Du Frontal, the valleys were deepened, a period of rest occurred, and then commenced the formation of the angular gravel and loess already mentioned. The angular gravel must have filled up the narrow valleys to the depth of 70 metres. Then the silty loess was deposited on the plateau. Subsequently, as the country rose, the angular gravel was nearly cleared out the valleys. The remains of the men of the reindeer period are also to be found in the upper silty loess, and the Eguisheim, Maestricht, and Lahr remains are instances. Above the loess no traces of palæolithic man are to be found, but those of the neolithic age abound. In spite of the new readings of Julius Cæsar's words, bos cervus, the remains of reindeer are not found amongst the relics of the Allemanni. The Olmo skull is of the same general age as the Eguisheim and Lahr remains, and to this period the skeletons of Cro-Magnon, of Bruniquel, of Bize, and very probably of Paviland may be appended. The age of the Cléchi-Montmartre bones is still in doubt, and those discovered in the sepulture of Aurignac were too much disturbed before they were carefully examined, to be considered of any exact antiquarian value.

THE LEGEND OF DUNBLANE.

IN TWO CHAPTERS. CHAPTER I.

"It was in the year 1793," said my uncle, "that I made the acquaintance of William Dunblane, afterwards Lord Dunblane at the University of St. Andrews. His bachelor uncle, the then lord, was not a very rich man, and he was a stingy one. William's father, too, was still alive, so that the young man was somewhat straitened as to money. We were just of an age, and my father was very liberal to me. Our relative positions, therefore, were more equal at that time than they afterwards became; and, in spite of the great difference of rank, Dunblane singled me out to be his favorite companion. I cannot say why this was, unless it may have been that I was a more patient listener than many other young fellows, to his long stories about his ancestry, and that while, I always endeavored to tell him the truth, I was more indulgent to this weakness of family pride than the rest were. They used to laugh at him, at first; but that, he soon showed them, he would never stand. He was very strong, and very passionate; and his face at such moments became as that of one possessed with a devil."

It was in these words that my uncle, Mr Carthews, senior partner in the firm of Carthews and Bontor, of Aberdeen and Calcutta, used generally to begin the following strange narrative. Like many Scotchmen of his day, he had a somewhat inordinate reverence for rank; but it was balanced, in his case, by a business-like appreciation of the value of money. What is of more import, however, to the matter in hand, was his strict and fearless adherence to truth, joined to an extremely kind nature. These characteristics were conspicuous in every transaction of a long life. He was a shrewd, upright man, universally respected in the city where he passed the best part of his life: "stiff in opinions," occasionally prolix but of a sound clear judgment, and unimpeached honesty. In the narrative, therefore, which I shall try to give, as far as possible, in my uncle's own words, there is, I am confident, no wilful misrepresentation, no jot or tittle added to the facts, as he believed them to be. And his opinion of those facts, I take it, was formed very deliberately. I heard him tell the story repeatedly, yet it never varied in the smallest particular; and I know it invariably impressed his hearers with a sense of horrible reality. Imagine that the ladies have left the room; three or four men are seated round the polished mahogany; my uncle, a white-haired, keen-eyed man of seventy, bids us draw our chairs nearer the fire, and, passing round a magnum of his fine old port, he thus continues the story of which I have given the opening words, with that incisive Scotch accent, and in that measured phrase which seems to weigh each word in the balance and reject it if found wanting.

Dunblane was an unpopular man. Men could not make him out. His manner was often disagreeable, and he was subject to moody fits, when he would speak to no one. He was capable of kind and generous acts, but implacable in his dislikes; and he never forgot an injury. I could manage him better than any one, and he would generally stand the truth from me; but his rage was a terrible thing to witness. I have never seen anything like it. Men used to say, "Keep clear of Dunblane when the fit is on him; he will stick at nothing."

The French Revolution was then at its height. Dunblane was a hot royalist, and used to be thrown into fresh transports of fury with the news of every act subversive of the king's authority. One night a man, in my room, who professed Republican sentiments, defended the conduct of the Assembly in imprisoning the royal family. Dunblane got up and flung a bottle at his head. There was a fine row, and it was arranged that the two men must fight the next morning. I secretly gave notice to the authorities, however, who interfered, and some sort of peace was patched up; but Dunblane never spoke to his antagonist again as long as he was in the university. I mention this as I happen to recall the circumstance, just to give you an idea of the man's violence, and of the depth of his resentment.

I can remember, too, a conversation we had one day about marriage. He had been complaining of his poverty, but said that, nevertheless, he meant to marry early.

"You see, it is necessary that I should have an heir lest the direct line become extinct. There is no one after me."

"Do nothing in a hurry," I replied. "It would be a great misfortune, no doubt, that the title and estates should pass away to another branch of the family, but it would be a still greater one to have your whole life embittered by an unhappy marriage. You are young; you have life before you. Be quite sure it is for your happiness, ere you take such a step as this."

His reply was very characteristic.

"O," he said, "it is all very well for you to talk, who have plenty of money, and have no great name as an inheritance. We trace back our descent for six hundred years; it is a duty we owe to the country to keep up the family. If I was fortunate enough to be in your position, I should please myself. But as it is everything else is of secondary importance. My lord is always telling me so, and I suppose he is right. I must marry a woman with money, and I must have an heir. You don't know," he added, with the black look gathering on his brow, "how essential this is."

I assured him that I fully recognized the obligations which a great name and title entail, but that I could not think that to contract a hasty, ill-considered marriage could ever answer in the long run.

"Ah!" he said. "Then you have never heard the old prophecy in the family:—

'When five Dunblanes have had no son,
Then shall the line direct be run.'

My uncle is the fourth lord who has had no son. If he should survive my father, and that I should succeed him, I shall be the fifth. You see now how necessary it is I should marry early."

"On account of a foolish distich!" I replied. His superstition almost amounted to an insanity; and I never would give in to it, though I confess that I have known more curious cases of such prophecies being fulfilled than any sceptical Englishman would believe. However, that has nothing to say to the matter in hand. Dunblane repeatedly referred to this prediction, which had evidently taken a hold upon his mind, not to be shaken by any words of mine. He would brood for hours over this and similar subjects. And among them, I have little doubt, was one to which he never referred at that time, seeing that I treated his superstitions with unbecoming levity,—a subject of which I had no knowledge for many years afterwards, but which was destined to have a fatal influence on his life.

In '96 I left college, and was sent out to our branch house in Calcutta. I heard the following year of Dunblane's marriage to a Miss Cameron, an orphan of good family, though not noble, said to possess both wealth and beauty; and I heard no more. He never wrote to me, nor did I expect it. Our lines of life were now quite different, and though I knew that he would always retain a friendly recollection of me, correspondence was another matter. I was a man of business, and engrossed in affairs in which he could take no interest; while I, on the other hand, knew nothing of the persons and the circumstances by which he was surrounded. I shall always regret that he did not write to me during those years, though probably no written words of mine could have been of any avail in arresting him; but I have occasionally found, in life, that the truth, though discarded at the time, will come back at some unexpected moment and give the Devil the lie. Now the Devil had it all his own way with Dunblane for years. His father, to whom I think he was really attached, was dead; his uncle, whom he disliked and feared, would not die. The uncle, I am told, proposed this marriage to him, and though Dunblane was indifferent—or more than indifferent—to the lady, he consented to marry her.

This was the fatal error which nothing could retrieve. It was the first step down hill, after which the descent became more and more rapid every year.

In 1803 Lord Dunblane did, at last, die, and, a few months later, my own father's death recalled me to Aberdeen, where I took his place as head of the house. One day, about a year after my return, George Pilson (you remember Pilson and Pilson, the attorneys?—very respectable firm) was in my office, and chanced to speak of Dunblane Castle, where he had lately been. His father, I found out, was Lord Dunblane's man of business; and I questioned George as to his lordship's present condition and mode of life. His answer was far from satisfactory.

"His lordship's strangeness and his violent ebullitions of temper have increased very much upon him of late," he said. "It is supposed that this is greatly owing to the fact that after nearly eight years of marriage there is no heir to the title. Then his wife is a person singularly unsuited to him in all ways. Her ladyship is handsome, but wanting in common sense, garrulous in the extreme, laughing immoderately in and out of season, and, if I may be allowed to express an opinion on such a point, deficient in the dignity befitting her station. These things are perpetual blisters, I fancy, to his lordship. Her ladyship, in a word, is what may be called a 'provoking woman,' and as his lordship is not the most patient of men, you may guess the consequences."

I replied that I was more sorry than surprised; from what I knew of Lord Dunblane I never expected that such a marriage—one purely of interest—could turn out well. "And yet," I added, "if he had fallen into other hands, I think he might have become a very different man. There were germs of good in him."

At this George Pilson remained silent for a few moments,—a silence which I thought most eloquent. He then proceeded to speak of the castle, which he described as one of the finest monuments of the fifteenth century remaining in the country.

"His lordship is very justly proud of it," he said, "though with his pride is mingled a certain superstitious awe, as, no doubt, you know? I dare say he has often spoken to you of the secret room in the castle?"

"No," I replied, "I do not remember that he ever did. What is there special about this room?"

He replied, "No one knows exactly where it is except the owner, the heir, and one other person, who happens, at present, to be my father. The family superstition concerning this room is very strong, and I believe they shrink from speaking of it."

"But what does it arise from?" I inquired.

He said, "The legend runs that some former Lord of Dunblane sold himself to the Devil in this room; the plain English of which is, I imagine, that he committed some foul crime there. At all events, this room has remained shut up for centuries; and it was predicted by one of those sibyls, who were given to such utterances, that, if ever the secret were made known, the ruin of the house would follow."

"Why," I exclaimed, "this is the second prophecy that has been made about the Dunblanes! One pays dearly for belonging to these great families if one is to be subject to all these superstitions. Do you know if the room is ever opened?"

"Yes, I believe so, once a year; when, if possible, the three who are in possession of the secret meet here. My father never speaks on the subject, of course, nor does Lord Dunblane."

I asked who the heir-at-law was. He told me they had had difficulty in finding him out. He was in some office in London, and in very poor circumstances, being descended from a younger branch of the Dunblanes, who had gone to settle in England in the beginning of the last century.

After some further conversation, Pilson took his leave, and I thought very little more about Lord Dunblane and his affairs, having concerns of my own which fully occupied my thoughts at that time.

Some weeks later I received, to my surprise, a letter from Lord Dunblane, saying that he had just heard from his man of business, Mr. Pilson, that I was returned from India, and living in Aberdeen; and that it would give him great pleasure to see me again, if I would pay him a visit at Dunblane Castle. He named a day when he was expecting a party; but added that if this time was not convenient to me, I could write myself, and propose some later date. It would have been ungracious to have refused such an invitation. Indeed, I was fully sensible of the honor, though I anticipated but little pleasure from this visit, under the present circumstances. A press of business retained me in Aberdeen just then, but I promised to write, and I did write, some weeks later, to his lordship, proposing to accompany Mr. Pilson, who informed me that he was going to Dunblane Castle; for I reflected that as the stage would take me no further than Nairn, we could share a post-chaise together, which would lighten the cost of a journey, in which business had no part. His lordship replied, in a few lines, to say I should be welcome; and accordingly, on the 10th of April, 1804, Pilson and I left Aberdeen by the stage, which started at 6 A. M., and reached Dunblane Castle late that afternoon. It was getting dusk as we drove up to this magnificent remnant of the feudal age,—a pile which impressed one with a sense of the power which must have belonged to the Dunblanes in past ages, and heightened their claim to consideration, in my eyes at least, more than the finest modern palace could have done. It was the grandest specimen of this style of architecture I ever saw, of vast extent, its sky-outline bristling with pointed turrets, its gray walls crowning a steep height covered with venerable Scotch firs, a dry moat surrounding it, and a gateway leading into a court-yard, which occupied nearly an acre, and round which the castle was built.

Lord Dunblane met us in the hall. The nine years which had elapsed since we had parted had wrought changes in us both, no doubt; but in the man I saw before me I should scarcely have recognized my fellow-student had I met him in the streets of Aberdeen. He was grown very large, and on his face, which was lined far beyond his years, the hard, wild look which had been transient formerly had settled down, apparently, into its habitual expression. He received me kindly, but there was no smile, as he shook my hand. The light had died out of the face, never to be rekindled. He told me I should have but a dull visit, he feared. "Had you come six weeks ago, when I wanted you, you would have met a country gathering; not that I like that sort of thing: I hate it; but you and I were always very different, Carthews. Now you will find no one; and I have a good deal of business with Mr. Pilson, so that I must leave Lady Dunblane to entertain you." I assured him that I should be perfectly happy, exploring the beauties of the park and adjoining forest, and begged him not to consider me for a moment. After that he led me up stairs to the drawing-room, where Lady Dunblane was seated alone.

The first impression produced on every one by her ladyship's beauty could not but be favorable. She was a brunette; tall, with lively eyes and brilliant teeth, which she showed a great deal when she laughed, and dark-brown hair, cut short and dishevelled in loose waves over her head. Upon this occasion, however, I saw nothing but a curl or two; for she wore a species of helmet, much affected, as I afterwards learnt, by women of condition, in that day, whose husbands commanded regiments of yeomanry, as did Lord Dunblane. Being the first head-gear of the kind which I had seen, its singularity struck me; but her ladyship carried this curious erection of buckram, fur, and tinsel, with a grace which forbade a thought of ridicule. Her beautiful figure was set off by a spenser of scarlet cloth, and a tight-fitting skirt of some white material which appeared to have been damped, it clung so close to her person. It was evident that her ladyship was not neglectful of her appearance, nor unmindful of the impression she made upon even an humble individual like myself. She came forward and greeted me with infinite suavity, saying:—

"It is amiable of you, Mr. Carthews, to come and take pity on our solitude. We see no one from one week's end to another in this castle of Otranto (you have read Mr. Walpole's romance?), where all is so gloomy and mysterious that, as I tell my lord, I am really alarmed sometimes at the sound of my own voice!"

"I wish that occurred rather oftener," muttered his lordship. She continued, laughing, "Our only society are the ghosts. You don't mind them, I hope? They are all of the oldest families, for we are mighty select here, you must know. If they visit you, you must esteem it a great honor, Mr. Carthews."

I replied in the same strain, that I felt myself to be wholly unworthy of that honor; but that, if they came, I would try and receive them with becoming courtesy.

"Like my parrot," cried her ladyship, laughing. "He and my spaniel sleep in my room; and sometimes, in the dead of night, he calls out, 'Pray, come in, and take a chair!' which startles me from my sleep, and frightens me out of my senses!"

His lordship said something about her having no senses to be frightened out of, I believe, and something about "brutes." She caught up the word, with a laugh,—

"Brutes? O yes; one gets accustomed to the society of brutes of any sort, when one has nothing else all day."

Such amenities passed between the two were of constant occurrence, I suppose, for they produced little effect beyond deepening the scowl on his lordship's face. As to me, I felt very uncomfortable, and the charm of Lady Dunblane's beauty had already melted away. Though not a stupid woman, I saw she was a very foolish one. How she dared to aggravate a man of such a temperament as her husband's amazed me. It was just like a child handling fire. She rattled away and laughed all that evening with little intermission. Lord Dunblane scarcely opened his lips. Over the wine Pilson and I talked; but his lordship stared moodily at the fire, and said nothing. I began to think I had made a mistake in coming all the way from Aberdeen for this. To play the part of chorus to a matrimonial duet of the most discordant character was not pleasant; and if my former friend was so self-absorbed as to be unable to speak to me, the sooner I left him the better. I suppose something of this sort struck him, for he said, as he wished me good night, "You must not mind my silence and absence of mind, Carthews. I am very glad to see you here; but my present position gives me many anxieties. I am irritated and worried until, by Heaven! I feel at times as if I should go mad."

Well, I went to bed, and slept soundly. I never was an imaginative man, you see, or the room I was in might have conjured up some of those spiritual visitants her ladyship had joked about, evidently to her lord's annoyance. Not that it was any worse than the other rooms in the castle. I take it they were all oak-panelled, with hideous family portraits grinning from the wall upon the occupants of the vast draped beds, in one of which I slept without waking, until the servant brought in my hot water for shaving. It was a bright morning, and at breakfast I found my host in better spirits than he had seemed the previous evening. I could not help speculating whether this could be in consequence of Lady Dunblane's absence. She never came down to breakfast, I found. Her maid, a most formidable-looking female, with red hair, and the muscles of a gillie, came in, I remember, with a tray, and took her ladyship's chocolate up to her. This person, I was afterwards told, had been born on the estate, and was devoted to Dunblane. She had been ill-spoken of as a girl; but Dunblane's mother had befriended and made this Elsie her body servant, and Dunblane had insisted, when he married, on her filling the same office to his wife, much to that lady's annoyance, who wished for a modish waiting-woman from Edinburgh or London. So much for this ill-favored specimen of her sex, to whom I never spoke in my life, but who impressed me very unfavorably whenever I saw her. After breakfast his lordship took me over the castle, and gave me all the historical associations connected with it, showing me, with great pride, the bed in which Queen Mary had slept, a yew-tree, said to have been planted by Robert Bruce, and the suit of armor borne by Dunblane of Dunblane at the battle of Bannockburn. He dilated on the glories of his house with more animation than I had yet observed; then suddenly the cloud came over him. "And to think," he said, "that all this must pass into another line,—into hands that have been debased by trade" (which was not polite to me; but he entirely forgot my presence for the moment, I am sure); "to think that people who have hardly a drop of old blood in their veins, who have intermarried for generations with Smiths and Browns, and plebeian names of that kind, should come to inherit this, which they have no feeling for, no pride in—by G—d, it is enough to wring one's heart!"

And this was the way he went on, from time to time, bursting out in imprecations on his fate in having no heir, and upon the evil star which had risen over his house. It was in vain that I pointed out that he was young still, and in good health, and must not abandon hope. He shook his head gloomily. "The prophecy is against me; it is no use.

'When five Dunblanes have had no son,

It is clear enough, is it not? I am doomed. I should have known it. When did such a prophecy ever come wrong? What a cursed fool I was to marry!"

So I thought; to marry, that is to say, as he had done; but I abstained from saying so. By and by his lordship took Mr. Pilson to his study, where they were engaged for some hours over business; and I was left alone to ramble about the castle, inside and out, as I would.

Remembering the story I had heard of a secret room, I counted all the windows outside, and then, returning to the castle, traversed every passage, mounted every turret, and opened every door I could, to see if the number of windows corresponded. With the help of the serving-man, whom I met on the stairs, and who knew all the rooms in the castle, he said, I accounted for each window satisfactorily. And after two hours' diligent endeavor to solve this mystery, I arrived at the conclusion that there could be no room,—it was all humbug. I was at a time of life, you see, when overconfidence in one's own powers is apt to lead one to very false conclusions.

At luncheon Lady Dunblane appeared, and an incident, which left a painful impression on my mind, took place on that occasion. Dunblane had a peculiar aversion to her ladyship's spaniel. Strict orders were given that he was to be confined to her ladyship's own suite of rooms, and on no account to be allowed beyond them. But some door had inadvertently been left open, and while we were at luncheon, the spaniel ran barking into the room, round and round the table, and finally straight between his lordship's legs, who was at that moment smarting under one of his wife's sallies. He roared out in a voice of thunder,—

"How often have I told you, ma'am, to keep that infernal little beast in your own room?" and he kicked out so viciously, that he sent the poor animal spinning along the oak floor to the further end of the room, where he lay howling. His mistress ran up, and seized him in her arms; the creature's leg was broken. Her ladyship shrieked, and stamped, and my lord swore; and, thoroughly sickened with the whole scene, I rose and left the room. Pilson joined me in the hall.

"What is to be the end of all this?" I said to him.

His answer was, "I am afraid to think."

"Lord Dunblane," I said, "seems to me to be losing all self-restraint. If he goes on thus, what will become of him?"

Pilson looked round him, then leaned forward and whispered, "He will end his days in a mad-house." Dunblane shut himself into his room for the rest of the afternoon. By and by her ladyship drove out in her coach and four, and carried her dog in her arms to a veterinary surgeon some miles off. At dinner she appeared in as brilliant spirits as ever. How much of this was real I cannot say; nor, supposing her hilarity to be assumed, whether it was done for the purpose of aggravating her lord. It certainly succeeded, if so. His moroseness was enlivened by several ferocious sallies. The conversation turned upon France, I remember, and on the probabilities of the First Consul's being made emperor, a subject that engrossed all minds just then.

"How I admire that little man!" exclaimed her ladyship. "How much greater to found a dynasty, Europe! I begin to wish I was a French woman!"

"I begin to wish you were!" cried my lord. "There is not another British peeress who would disgrace herself by uttering such a sentiment."

She laughed aloud, and replied, "Oh! because they are less frank than I am. All women admire Le Petit Caporal in their hearts. What fun it will be if he comes over here, and conquers us! It will be much nicer being the subjects of a great hero, instead of the subjects of a mad old king who —"

"Hold your tongue, ma'am!" shouted Dunblane, bringing his fist down upon the table with a force which made the glasses clatter: "or, if you will talk your low, treasonous rubbish, go and talk it in the kitchen. You shall not talk it here!"

She only laughed in reply. She certainly seemed to take a delight in provoking him; and, as she knew his sensitive points, this was not difficult. I found an opportunity, over a game of cribbage, later in the evening, of asking her why she acted thus. No doubt this was somewhat of a liberty, considering our short acquaintance; but I felt I could not remain longer in the house without trying to amend matters.

"Oh!" she said, "anything for a little excitement in this horribly monotonous life. I should die of ennui if it was n't for the tiffs with my lord."

I told her she did not know what harm she was doing; and I asked if she never felt afraid of irritating a man so passionate as his lordship.

"Bless you, no," was her reply. "It is he who is afraid, really, of me,—of my tongue, you see. Ha, ha! No one ever answered him before; his mother, his servants, his friends, why,—you yourself, I dare say, you never contradicted him? Now, I always do, and I always say just what I like. He hates me, of course, but he is afraid of me, Mr. Cartwells. Ha, ha, ha!"

Good heavens! I thought to myself, and these two people are tied to each other for life. Both have a fair chance of living for the next forty years. What a prospect! Even before we separated for the night she had stung him with another of her irritating speeches. There had been some talk of the steward's boy, who had tumbled from a tree, and had broken his leg. . . . "Children are a horrid bore," said Lady Dunblane. "Thank Heaven, I have no brat to be tumbling from trees, and worrying one's life out."

I dare say she did not mean it. It is hardly possible that, under the circumstances, she should not have wished for a child. The devil was in the woman, constantly prompting something to aggravate her husband. His back was towards me, on this occasion, and he said nothing, so I could only judge of the effect produced upon him by his instantly lighting a chamber candlestick and leaving the room. We saw him no more that night.

The next day and the day following only further developed the hopeless condition of affairs between Lord and Lady Dunblane. I tried once to speak to him on the subject, but I found it was in vain. An ineradicable hatred of his wife had grown up in him, which he did not attempt to conceal. When alone with him, he would occasionally converse; in her presence he seemed to be perpetually on the lookout for what might drop from her irrepressible tongue. The fourth day of my stay at the castle,—the day before I was obliged to return to Aberdeen,—arrived, and with it came a guest, who, although expected, was evidently anything but welcome. This was Mr. James Dunblane, the heir-at-law, who had only lately been traced, and between whom and Lord Dunblane certain communications had passed by letter. This was his first visit to the castle,—a visit which, as I afterwards learnt, was a matter almost of necessity. He seemed to feel the awkwardness of his position. I do not remember much about the young man, except that he was plain in person, and very quiet. Lord Dunblane, received him coldly, but politely. Lady Dunblane, after the usual fashion, plunged at once into the subject of all others his lordship shrank from any notice of.

"So you are come, as heir-at-law, to be let into the secret of this famous room, are you? Why, it is as bad as being made a freemason! . . . Can you keep a secret, Mr. Dunblane? because, if not, untold misfortunes are to befall us." And the laugh with which she concluded sounded to me like the screech of an owl foreboding evil. Lord Dunblane looked as if he could have stabbed her, but he only muttered an oath under his breath, and clenched his fist,—a movement which no one saw but myself. Every incident of that evening is fresh in my recollection. I remember how she returned again and again to that subject, as though it had a fatal fascination for her, but more likely, I fear, because she saw that her husband writhed under it. She ridiculed the prophecy, and laughed at all those superstitions which his lordship cherished as his religion. It was distressing to watch him the while. He was far quieter than usual, scarcely spoke, but sat, his arms crossed, staring at the fire, with eyes which burnt, themselves, like coals, and when he swore, which he did once or twice, it was in a suppressed voice, contrasting strangely with his usual violence. But there was a vibration in the tone which showed how strongly he was stirred. At last, it was late in the evening, and we were sitting round her ladyship's tea-table, when she committed her crowning act of folly by offering to lay a wager with any one that she would find out the secret room herself. I need hardly say no one accepted the challenge. But she was not to be discouraged. She had seen her husband's face go white, and the look which he had shot at her gave a zest to her audacious scheme. She repeated her declaration that she would penetrate this wonderful mystery. Such things were well enough to frighten old women with in the Middle Ages, but how any one could believe in predictions and other rubbish of this kind in the present day passed her comprehension. For her part she had no faith in anything of the kind, and to prove what folly it was, she should leave no stone unturned to discover this room, about which such a fuss was made: after which the secret, she declared, should remain one no longer. I tried to stop her; Pilsdon tried to stop her; it was all no use. She had got the bit between her teeth, so to speak, and away she went, partly to show off, and partly out of spite, regardless what she said, provided it produced an effect and inflamed my lord yet more. She pictured, laughingly, the cobwebbed condition of the room, and how she would turn in the housemaid with broom and duster; after which she would give an evening party there, and invite all the ghosts to come, if they chose,— "indeed, the black gentleman himself!" . . . Poor woman, she little knew what she was invoking. No one laughed. Even the heir, who, being shy, always smiled when required, looked too stupefied to comply with the demand on this occasion. To glance at Lord Dunblane's face was enough to check any inclination to hilarity. I have never forgotten its expression. I had witnessed his ungovernable passion scores of times, prompting him to sudden acts of violence. But now, there was a certain admixture of fear (she had divined rightly, I saw, when she said he was afraid of her) with the rage which trembled through his whole frame, the like of which I have never beheld but once since in my life. I saw a beast-tamer enter the hyenas' den at the show last year. The aspect of their malignant fury cowed by terror, but watching for its opportunity to burst forth, the savage hissing where-with they received the lash and showed their fangs, recalled to me Dunblane's demeanor as he listened to his wife. . . . At last, I could stand it no longer, and made up my mind to tell a lie.

"Lady Dunblane," I said, "like most Scotchmen, I am a trifle superstitious. This is my last night under your hospitable roof, and I am sure you would not willingly disturb its rest. You are so happily constituted as to be above fear of any kind. Others are weaker. Let me earnestly advise you to leave all the superstitions connected with Dunblane Castle alone. Believe me, 'there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in your ladyship's philosophy.'"

She burst out a-laughing, as usual. "O Mr. Carthews, I'm ashamed of you. But I see what it is. You are afraid, not of the ghosts and the predictions, but of my lord. Well, I shall see you in May, when I pass through Aberdeen on my way south, and I shall tell you all about it then; for, depend upon it, I shall have found out the secret by that time."

And so, in the insolence of youth and high spirits and an indomitable will, she bade me good night, poor woman, and I never saw her again.

Dunblane had left the room. Whether it was prearranged that Pilson and the young heir were to join him in his study, and that later in the night, the door of the secret room should be unclosed, I know not. I am inclined, from one or two circumstances, to think that it was so; but, again, there are other things which have made me doubt it. At all events, when we three bade each other good night, neither Pilson nor young Dunblane dropped anything which should lead me to suppose they were not going straight to their own rooms. They were not to leave the castle till the day after me. It was quite possible, therefore, that the chamber was to be unlocked after my departure.

SAINTE-BEUVE.

BY MATTHEW ARNOLD.

THIS is neither the time nor the place to attempt any complete account of the remarkable man whose pen, busy to the end, and to the end charming and instructing us, has within the last few weeks dropped from his hand forever. A few words are all that the occasion allows, and it is hard not to make them words of mere regret and eulogy. Most of what is at this moment written about him is in this strain, and very naturally; the world has some arrears to make up to him, and now, if ever, it feels this. Late, and as it were by accident, he came to his due estimation in France; here in England it is only within the last ten years that he can be said to have been publicly known at all. We who write these lines knew him long and owed him much; something of that debt we will endeavor to pay, not, as we ourselves might be most inclined, by following the impulse of the hour and simply praising him, but, as he himself would have preferred by recalling what in sum he chiefly was, and what is the essential scope of his effort and working.

Shortly before Sainte-Beuve's death appeared a new edition of his Portraits Contemporains, one of his earlier works, of which the contents date from 1832 and 1833, before his method and manner of criticism were finally formed. But the new edition is enriched with notes and retouches added as the volumes were going through the press, and which bring our communications with him down to these very latest months of his life. Among them is a comment on a letter of Madame George Sand, in which she had spoken of the admiration excited by one of his articles. "I leave this as it stands," says he, "because the sense and the connection of the passage require it; but, personne ne sait mieux que moi à quoi s'en tenir sur le mérite absolu de ces articles qui sont tout au plus, et même lorsqu'ils réussissent le mieux, des choses sensées dans un genre médiocre. Ce qu'ils ont eu d'alerte et d'à-propos à leur moment suffit à peine à expliquer ces exagérations de l'amitié. Réservons l'admiration pour les œuvres de poésie et d'art, pour les compositions élevées; la plus grande gloire du critique est dans l'approbation et dans l'estime des bons esprits."

This comment, which extends to his whole work as a critic, has all the good-breeding and delicacy by which Sainte-Beuve's writing was distinguished, and it expresses, too, what was to a great extent, no doubt, his sincere conviction. Like so many who have tried their hand at œuvres de poésie et d'art, his preference, his dream, his ideal, was there; the rest was comparatively journeyman work, to be done well and estimably rather than ill and discreditably, and with precious rewards of its own besides in exercising the faculties and in keeping off ennui; but still work of an inferior order.

Yet when one looks at the names on the title-page of the Portraits Contemporains: Chateaubriand, Béranger, Lamennais, Lamartine, Victor Hugo, George Sand, — names representing, in our judgment, very different degrees of eminence, but none of which we have the least inclination to disparage, — is it certain that the works of poetry and art to which these names are attached eclipse the work done by Sainte-Beuve? Could Sainte-Beuve have had what was no doubt his will, and in the line of the Consolations and Volupté have produced works with the power and vogue of Lamartine's works, or Chateaubriand's, or Hugo's, would he have been more interesting to us to-day, — would he have stood permanently higher? We venture to doubt it. Works of poetry and art like Molière's and Milton's eclipse no doubt all productions of the order of the Causeries du Lundi, and the highest language of admiration may very properly be reserved for such works alone. Inferior works in the same kind have their moment of vogue when their admirers apply to them this language; there is a moment when a drama of Hugo's finds a public to speak of it as if it were Molière's, and a poem of Lamartine's finds a public to speak of it as if it were Milton's. At no moment will a public be found to speak of work like Sainte-Beuve's Causeries in such fashion; and if this alone were regarded, one might allow one's self to leave to his work the humbler rank which he assigns to it. But the esteem inspired by his work remains and grows, while the vogue of all works of poetry and art but the best, and the high-pitched admiration which goes with vogue, diminish and disappear; and this redresses the balance.

Five-and-twenty years ago it would have seemed absurd, in France, to place Sainte-Beuve, as a French author, on a level with Lamartine. Lamartine had at that time still his vogue, and though assuredly no Molière or Milton, had for the time of his vogue the halo which surrounds properly none but great poets like these. To this Sainte-Beuve cannot pretend, but what does Lamartine retain of it now? It would still be absurd to place Sainte-Beuve on a level with Molière or Milton; is it any longer absurd to place him on a level with Lamartine, or even above him? In other words, excellent work in a lower kind counts in the long run above work which is short of excellence in a higher; first-rate criticism has a permanent value greater than that of any but first-rate works of poetry and art.

And Sainte-Beuve's criticism may be called first-rate. His curiosity was unbounded, and he was born a naturalist, carrying into letters, so often the mere domain of rhetoric and futile amusement, the ideas and methods of scientific natural inquiry. And this he did while keeping in perfection the ease of movement and charm of touch which belong to letters properly so called, and which give them their unique power of universal penetration and of propagandism. Man, as he is, and as his history and the productions of his spirit show him, was the object of his study and interest; he strove to find the real data with which, in dealing with man and his affairs, we have to do. Beyond this study he did not go, — to find the real data. But he was determined they should be the real data, and not fictitious and conventional data, if he could help it. This is what, in our judgment, distinguishes him, and makes his work of singular use and instructiveness. Most of us think that we already possess the data required, and have only to proceed to deal with human affairs in the light of them. This is, as is well known, a thoroughly English persuasion. It is what makes us such keen politicians; it is an honor to an Englishman, we say, to take part in political strife. Solomon says, on the other hand, "It is an honor to a man to cease from strife, but every fool will be meddling"; and Sainte-Beuve held with Solomon. Many of us, again, have principles and connections which are all in all to us, and we arrange data to suit them; — a book, a character, a period of history, we see from a point of view given by our principles and connections, and to the requirements of this point of view we make the book, the character, the period, adjust themselves. Sainte-Beuve never did so, and criticised with unflinching acuteness those who did. "Tocqueville arrivait avec son moule tout prêt; la réalité n'y répond pas, et les choses ne se prêtent pas à y entrer."

M. de Tocqueville commands much more sympathy in England than his critic, and the very mention of him will awaken impressions unfavorable to Sainte-Beuve; for the French Liberals honor Tocqueville and at heart dislike Sainte-Beuve; and people in England always take their cue from the French Liberals. For that very reason have we boldly selected for quotation this criticism on him, because the course criticised in Tocqueville is precisely the course with which an Englishman would sympathize, and which he would be apt to take himself; while Sainte-Beuve, in criticising him, and by which he is of use to us. Tocqueville, as is well known, finds in the ancient régime all the germs of the centralization which the French Revolution developed and established. This centralization is his bugbear, as it is the bugbear of English Liberalism; and directly he finds it, the system where it appears is judged. Disliking, therefore, the French Revolution for its centralization, and then finding centralization in the ancient régime also, he at once sees in this discovery, "mille motifs nouveaux de haïr l'ancien régime." How entirely does every Englishman abound here as the French say, in Tocqueville's sense; how faithfully have all Englishmen repeated and roeched Tocqueville's book on the ancient régime ever since it was published; how incapable are they of supplying, or of imagining the need of supplying, any corrective to it! But hear Sainte-Beuve:—

"Dans son effroi de la centralisation, l'auteur en vient à méconnaître de grands bienfaits d'équité dus à Richelieu et à Louis XIV. Homme du peuple ou bourgeois, sous Louis XIII, ne valait-il pas mieux avoir affaire à un intendant, à l'homme du roi, qu'à un gouverneur de province, à quelque duc d'Epemon? Ne maudissons pas ceux à qui nous devons les commencements de l'égalité devant la loi, la première ébauche de l'ordre moderne qui nous a affranchis, nous et nos pères, et le tiers-état tout entier, de cette quantité de petits tyrans qui couvraient le sol, grands seigneurs ou hobereaux."

The point of view of Sainte-Beuve is as little that of a glowing Revolutionist as it is that of a chagrined Liberal; it is that of a man who seeks the truth about the ancient régime and its institutions, and who instinctively seeks to correct anything strained and arranged in the representation of them. "Voyons les choses de l'histoire telles qu'elles se sont passées."

At the risk of offending the prejudices of English readers we have thus gone for an example of Sainte-Beuve's essential method to a sphere where his application of it makes a keen impression, and created for him, in his lifetime, warm enemies and detractors. In that sphere it is not easily permitted to a man to be a naturalist, but a naturalist Sainte-Beuve could not help being always. Accidentally, at the end of his life, he gave delight to the Liberal opinion of his own country and ours by his famous speech in the Senate on behalf of free thought. He did but follow his instinct, however, of opposing, in whatever medium he was, the current of that medium when it seemed excessive and tyrannous. The extraordinary social power of French Catholicism makes itself specially felt in an assembly like the Senate. An elderly Frenchman of the upper class is apt to be, not unfrequently, a man of pleasure, reformed or exhausted, and the deference of such a personage to repression and Cardinals is generally excessive. This was enough to rouse Sainte-Beuve's opposition; but he would have had the same tendency to oppose the heady current of a medium where mere Liberalism reigned, where it was Professor Fawcett, and not the Archbishop of Bordeaux, who took the bit in his teeth.

That Sainte-Beuve stopped short at curiosity, at the desire to know things as they really are, and did not press on with faith and ardor to the various and immense applications of this knowledge which suggest themselves, and of which the accomplishment is reserved for the future, was due in part to his character, but more to his date, his period, his circumstances. Let it be enough for a man to have cians and rhetoricians to have been a naturalist, at a time when for any good and lasting work in government and literature our old conventional draught of the nature of things wanted in a thousand directions reverifying and correcting.

MR. BAKER'S RING.

MR. BAKER himself told us this story. He said it was true; nor is this unlikely. I have known Mr. William Henry Baker personally for a number of years, and I am inclined to think he has hitherto never in all his life told the truth. Now, it is so manifestly improbable that the most consistent man should protract a long and useful career of story-telling to such extraordinary limits, without at some period telling the truth by sheer misadventure, that it is quite likely Mr. Baker may have committed himself in this instance. At least, the time has arrived for human nature to assert itself, according to the doctrine of averages.

"Only once, gentlemen," said Mr. B., "have I been deceived. William Henry keeps his eyes open, in a general way; William Henry also takes the liberty of seeing out of them. He uses them, as a rule, for purposes of observation, gentlemen. Still, I admit I was, once, taken in by as dead a swindle as could be; I am not ashamed to own it. I made money by it, after all; but I was swindled.

"It was about a diamond ring. I knew the fellow who had it for many years in the way of business. He was a commercial traveller, and used always to flash this ring about whenever he came round on his journeys. A jeweller friend of mine, who happened to be in my office once when Mr. Blook called, asked, I remember, to be allowed to examine it; and had pronounced the stones to be diamonds of the purest water, telling me afterwards the ring was worth about seventy pounds. Mr. Blook's initials were engraved inside the hoop of the ring: 'R. B.'; and besides that, it was a ring of peculiar and rather old-fashioned make. Indeed, having once seen the ring, no one would be likely to mistake it for another. Well, Mr. Blook got into difficulties, and went so entirely to the bad, that I never saw or heard anything more of him. But about two years afterwards, whilst walking down a back street, my eye was taken by a ring exhibited in a pawnbroker's window. 'Mr. Blook's ring,' I exclaimed directly; 'I'll swear to it.' It was in a tray with a number of very seedy-looking rings, and was as discolored and dirty as they were. I went into the shop and asked to look at it. The pawnbroker, an old Jew, said, 'Yesh; I might see his ringsh; but he did n't know mosh about ringsh himself. They wosh unredeemed pledges, — thash what they wosh, — and they wosh all marked at the monish advanshed upon them, with a very shmall overplush for interesh, — thash all he knew.'

"There was no mistake about it. It was Mr. Blook's ring, and had his initials inside. But how did the Jew get it? He would soon tell me. Referring to his book, he found it had been pawned two years ago in the name of Smith, — 'Thash all he knew. Would I buy? It wosh dirt sheap, — three poundsh twelve; and cosht him all the monish!'

"'Three pounds twelve!' I repeated, thinking he had made a mistake; for the ring was worth twenty times that amount!

ones, — beautiful ringsh, he dare shay, — but he knew sho little about ringsh, you shее, exshept that he alwaysh advanshed too mosh monish on them. One could n't undershand everything in his bish-nish, you shее, from flat-ironsh to diamonsh."

"I bought the ring, after beating the Jew down half a crown, partly to prevent his suspecting its value, and partly — well knowing the disposition of the peculiar people — to oblige him.

"I wore my new purchase about, with no little inward satisfaction at having bettered a Jew at a bargain. In my own mind, I accounted for its coming into his possession somewhat in this way: Mr. Blook must have sold the ring when in difficulties to some one else. It was quite certain Mr. Blook had not pawned it at the Jew's, or the Jew would have known its value. The ring must, then, have either been lost by, or stolen from, a subsequent possessor; and the finder, or thief (whichever it happened to be), being ignorant of its value, had taken it to the Jew, who knew no better.

"There is a certain commercial club in our town, which I occasionally visit. The members are of an easy and somewhat lively disposition; generally given to indulge in that playful style of banter popularly known as 'chaff.' My diamond ring came in for a good share of it. I can stand chaff as well as most men; but I put it to you, if, when you know very well your brilliants are real, it is n't a little annoying for the chaff of a whole body of people to assume the character of persistent disbelief in the value of your jewelry? For instance, the waiter answers the bell.

"'Did any gentleman ring?'

"'O yes,' one of the members would retort; 'it was the gentleman with the paste diamonds.'

"Again, there are kinds of sham brilliants known as Irish Diamonds and Isle of Wight Diamonds. The club (not one or two members, but the whole body) refused to recognize such distinctions, and insisted on designating the whole class of shams as 'Baker's Diamonds.' 'Baker's Paste,' my gems were also denominated. They actually sent me by post a circular of somebody's Baking Powder, adding to it at the end, where it says the public is respectfully cautioned against spurious imitations, 'but more particularly against a specious preparation to deceive the unwary, known as Baker's "Paste."' Now, after two or three weeks, this became tiresome. Still, I took no notice, and affected not to think the remarks intended for me.

"I hardly know what made me go and call on my friend, the jeweller. It was not that I had any doubt of the genuineness of the diamonds, especially as he was the very man who had before valued Mr. Blook's ring at seventy pounds. But it had been so dinned into my head they were false, that I wanted just a formal confirmation of the estimate he had previously formed of their worth.

"'O yes,' said my friend the jeweller; 'I recognize the ring again directly. — Want to know what it's worth?' (He put it in the scales.) 'Well — h'm — about seven-and-twenty shillings for old gold.'

"'Eh?' said I, as pale as a turnip. 'Why, did n't you tell me it was worth seventy pounds?'

"'Yes,' he answered; 'when it had diamonds in it, — not when it has paste.'

"Talking the matter over, the jeweller suggested, that on Mr. Blook getting into difficulties, the first thing he did was to sell the diamonds out of his whilst, finally, he had pawned it himself with the Jew, as a paste ring.

"Well, William Henry," said I to myself, 'the Jew has jewed you, and the club has chaffed you, and you may consider yourself trod upon, after the manner of speaking.'

"But the worm will turn.

"Did the jeweller let out diamonds on hire?' I asked.

"He did.

"Would he have a certain alteration, which I suggested, made in my ring in a fortnight's time?"

"He would.

"And keep it secret?"

"Certainly, — business was business."

"For the whole of that fortnight I never went near the club; that was probably the reason why my appearance at the club-dinner was greeted with such lively sallies about Baker's Paste. One would-be wag recommended me, whilst helping a tart, 'to keep my fingers out of the pastry.' Believing him to intend some obscure allusion to the gems on my little finger, I thought it time to open fire.

"Gentlemen," said I, 'for some weeks I have listened to casual observations in which the name of Baker has been unworthily associated with paste and pastry, but have refrained from making any remark, having been firmly persuaded they could only apply to industrious tradesmen employed in the manufacture of home-baked bread.' (Oh, oh!) 'It now occurs to me that such remarks were intended in allusion to the ring I wear, — a ring, — I take this opportunity of informing you, — which, unlike the wits who have amused themselves at its expense, is indebted for its brilliancy to nature.'

"They hooted me; they heaped opprobrious epithets on the name of Baker; they laughed and talked me down.

"I'll bet him five pounds it's paste," said one.

"So will I," said another. 'And I.' 'And I.'

"So said eleven of them.

"Really, gentlemen," said I, 'I am sorry you should take the matter so much in earnest. All I can tell you is, I believe my ring to be a diamond ring, and this, notwithstanding I will freely admit I only paid a very small sum for it.'

"They laughed and hooted me still more at this admission. They said that settled the question, and that it was paste.

"I told them I did n't think it was.

"Well, would I bet?"

"I would rather not.

"More hooting.

"At length, very reluctantly, I overcame my scruples. The name of Baker is a name too closely allied to the gentle bred (arms, four loaves, ppr — sejant, quartered, — crest, the doe, levant) to allow it to be wantonly sullied. I bet.

"We adjourned to the jeweller's.

"Without question, they were diamonds,' the jeweller decided, 'and some of the finest he had ever seen.' He ought to know, as they were his property, — hired by me for the occasion.

"Eleven fives is fifty-five, gentlemen."

"Having established the value of my ring, and freed the name of Baker from suspicion, I paid for the hire of the real gems, and had the paste stones reset in their places, believing, after all, the reputation for diamonds to be as good as the possession of them, and free from the anxiety.

"It was talked about, and noised abroad: it even reached the little back street where the pawn-broker lived. You should have seen him.

"Real shtones! O my heart! Sheventy-five poundish — dead robbery — clean gone. O my bootshe and bones! not to know that folkshe do shometimes come and pawn real diamonsh for pashte, sho as to have less interest to pay for taking care of their ringsh. O my blesshed heart, only think of it!"

"He came to me. He grovelled, and wriggled, and twisted himself before me. He prayed me to sell him his ring again. 'O my tere Mishter Baker, you musht shell it to me, or I shall be a ruined old manshe. The time wosh not out, and Mishter Smit has come to redeem it, and he shays that it wosh a legacy, and if he doesh not get it by Shaturday next he will ruin me, — sh-help him, he will. O Mishter Baker, think of it; twenty poundish — all in gold — sholid money. Now my tere, what do you shay? thersh a good mansh!"

"What did I say? Could I turn a deaf ear to the distress of the old man? There are people who might do it, gentlemen, but not people of the name of Baker, — not W. H. Baker. I certainly did ask him for more money. We compromised it at last at twenty-two ten, which he paid, part in sixpences and coppers, and owes me fourpence-halfpenny to this day.

"Twenty-two, nine and sevenpence-halfpenny, and fifty-five pounds, is seventy-seven, nine, seven and a half. It just paid for the real diamonds; for I bought the ones I had previously hired of the jeweller, and had them set in a ring the fac-simile of Mr. Blook's, except that the initials inside are W. H. B.

"That was the only time I was ever swindled gentlemen," Mr. Baker concluded.

DR. LIVINGSTONE AND THE SOURCES OF THE NILE.

THE despatch in which Dr. Livingstone describes his discoveries as to the true sources of the Nile stamp him as one of the greatest explorers who ever lived will probably compel us to revise all geographies of Africa except Ptolemy's, — fancy Ptolemy instructing Sir R. Murchison in his own subject! — and will certainly modify profoundly the popular conception as to the interior of Africa, but they will hardly excite as much interest as the little postscript telling the Foreign Secretary of a race in South Central Africa called the Rua, who dwell in excavated caves, some of them thirty miles long, and fit to contain a district when besieged; who have "pictures" or "writings" of some kind, and who have eyes "whose outer angle slopes inward," a curious statement, which may mean only that the Rua have Japanese eyes, or may by possibility mean that these Troglodytes have acquired from their mode of life some physical peculiarity. The statement is far too vague for any real discussion, but it excites the imagination far more than greater discoveries, appealing as it does to an impression which has cropped out in all ages, that men might conceivably be found differing greatly in physique from the human standard, an impression as yet supported by no evidence whatever of any importance, for Mr. Gibson's man urang was in all probability a lusus naturæ.

Let us turn to the Nile. Nearly three years ago, nine Johanna men, who had accompanied Dr. Livingstone on his journey to determine the Nilotic watershed, appeared at Zanzibar with the news of the great explorer's death. The story which they told was so well concocted, and the evidence they adduced so very conclusive, that Dr. Kirk's sagacity was for once at fault, and Livingstone's former companion fully believed that his quondam leader had been brutally murdered in Central Africa. With the details of this mendacious story the world is now familiar. Mr. Young's search expedition relieved the public anxiety, and, subsequently, news from Dr. Livingstone himself confirmed our hopes of his safety. This intelligence came from Bamba, and was dated February, 1867; since it was received nothing has been, until within the last few days, known of the Doctor's whereabouts.

Again the anxiety of the public has been aroused, the hope deferred gradually gave way to despair, and but few believed that the intrepid traveller was not dead. Sir Roderick Murchison steadily refused his countenance to this fear, and by a number of letters to the public press, suggesting from time to time certain hypotheses to account for his friend's prolonged silence, sought to dissipate the doubts and to sustain the hopes of all who felt an interest in the traveller's welfare. But as month after month rolled by, the confidence of the public visibly lessened until the number of those who really believed in Livingstone's safety had become small indeed. Suddenly, however, a telegram was received stating that Dr. Livingstone had been heard of and that he was not only alive and well, but had found what he believed to be the sources of the Nile. The news thus flashed home to us from India has been verified. No wonder that Sir Roderick Murchison and the Royal Geographical Society were jubilant; for not only had extracts from Dr. Livingstone's letters been sent from Zanzibar by Dr. Kirk, but while the meeting was in progress Lord Clarendon sent the full despatch which he had received from the Consul-explorer himself. This despatch, to say nothing of the letters, cleared up all doubts, and the wonderful sagacity of Sir Roderick Murchison again received the testimony of proof. Nothing probably, in the history of geographical enterprise was ever regarded with more sincere satisfaction by the whole nation than this conclusive intelligence relative to the safety of the greatest of our explorers.

But our delight at the prospect of seeing Dr. Livingstone again in the flesh must not be allowed to overshadow the intense interest attaching to his discoveries. Although in July, 1868, — the date of his last despatch, — Dr. Livingstone had not even seen Lake Tanganyika, and of course could not positively testify that the lake drained into the Nile, he had yet found sufficient evidence, to say nothing of native information, to justify the opinion that not only Tanganyika, but a series of more southerly lakes contribute their quota of waters to the "river of Egypt." If this opinion should prove to be correct, he will have solved the great problem of modern geography, and established his claim to a place in the foremost rank of geographers of all ages. Ptolemy's mysterious knowledge will prove to have been something real, and Defoe's imagination will be regarded as having been strangely prophetic. In order to appreciate what Dr. Livingstone has done, or is doing, it must be clearly understood what he was sent to accomplish. The dispute between Captain Burton and Captain Speke relative to the drainage of Lake Tanganyika could not be settled except by personal investigation. Burton believed that this lake flowed into the Nile, but in such a case Speke's

Victoria N'yanza would not be the ultimate source of the river. The latter therefore maintained with rather ingenious logic that the Tanganyika drained southwards, — probably into the Nyassa, and thence into the Zambezi. Moreover, when Burton and Speke were on the lake its altitude was fixed by them at 1,844 feet, and if this were correct, it would be impossible, supposing other observations to be correct also, for the Nile to receive the waters of the Tanganyika. Baker made the elevation of the Albert N'yanza to be 2,720 feet, and as his observations were carefully tested on his return to England, their accuracy may be relied on. But Speke's thermometer — with which his observations were taken — read 214° instead of 212° when brought down to the coast again, and Mr. Findlay has always argued that 1,000 feet should be added to the altitude at which Captain Speke fixed the lake. This would give it an elevation of 2,844 feet; and as Sir Samuel Baker had shown the Albert N'yanza to be but 2,720 feet, the Tanganyika would be 124 feet higher than the Nilotic reservoir, and the physical difficulty which seemed to intervene between it and the Nile would thus be removed. Dr. Livingstone was directed to settle this question, to ascertain the altitude of the Tanganyika and the direction of its drainage, and to determine the nature of the whole watershed of this part of Africa. How much he had done towards this in July of last year, the interesting despatch to Lord Clarendon which was read before the Geographical Society clearly shows, and there seems to be little doubt that during the sixteen months that have elapsed since he wrote, he has completed the great work which he undertook.

At the time of writing his despatch, Dr. Livingstone had not reached the Tanganyika, but he had found a chain of lakes to the south which drained towards the north, and, as he believed, through the Tanganyika into the Nile. These lakes are fed by numerous rivers of considerable size, and should they prove to be the head-waters of the Nile, we must look for the sources of the mighty river at least four hundred miles south of the most southerly point of the Victoria N'yanza. The river Chambese seems to connect these lakes with each other and with the Tanganyika, and the whole volume of water which they contain in all probability finds its way into the Nile. We must wait for further information before we can say positively that these lakes and rivers are within the basin of the Nile, but there is every probability that the opinions which have been expressed in favor of this hypothesis will soon be verified. Meanwhile we cannot but feel extremely interested in the descriptions which Dr. Livingstone gives of the places which he has visited, and which prove that in the region now opened up for the first time there are spots as beautiful and as blessed by nature as anything that we can imagine. Speaking of Lake Liemba, one of the chain which he has discovered, Dr. Livingstone tells us that "it lies in a hollow, with precipitous sides 2,000 feet down; it is extremely beautiful, sides, top, and bottom being covered with trees and other vegetation. Elephants, buffaloes, and antelopes feed on the steep slopes, while hippopotami, crocodiles, and fish swarm in the waters. Guns being unknown, the elephants, unless sometimes deceived into a pitfall, have it all their own way. It is as perfect a natural paradise as Xenophon could have desired. On two rocky islands men till the land, rear goats, and catch fish: the villages ashore are embowered in the palm-oil palms of the West Coast of Africa." Livingstone's present journey has only confirmed what was brought to light in his previous travels, viz.: That instead of the interior of Africa being a sandy desert, as was formerly thought, it is really rich in vegetation, and studded with lakes. But there is another fact which Dr. Livingstone has discovered in connection with Lake Liemba, and which goes far towards outweighing all others in importance. The altitude of this lake the Doctor ascertained to be 2,840 feet, thus showing that Speke's observations were incorrect, and that Mr. Findlay was probably right in saying Speke had made a mistake of about 1,000 feet in his calculations. But we must wait until Dr. Livingstone comes home for the detailed information which will enable geographers to pronounce their final judgment on the Nile question. If the great explorer traces the lake system which he has discovered into the Tanganyika, and should find, on arriving at Ujiji, the stores and medicines sent there for his use, he will proceed to the northern end of the lake, and perhaps follow its affluent. Sir Roderick Murchison thinks he will return to Zanzibar after having ascertained the direction of the drainage of the Tanganyika, but Captain Sherard Osborn considers that he will probably follow the outlet, and see for himself whether it flows into the Albert N'yanza, and thence into the Nile. In the latter case, Dr. Livingstone would, in all likelihood, meet Sir Samuel Baker, and the result of this meeting would be to clear up the great mystery which, for centuries, has shrouded the head-waters of the Nile.

OXFORD SLANG.

A STORY is told by Herodotus of a certain king of Egypt, who wished to find out whether or not the language which his subjects spoke was the oldest in the world. He gave orders, accordingly, that two children who could not yet talk should be separated from their parents and should be brought up by themselves in a place where there should be no possibility of their hearing any language spoken, Egyptian or other. All inarticulate mumbings and gurglings, in which modern mothers love to find such deep and mysterious meaning, were to be disregarded, but the peasant to whose care the infants were confided had strict orders to report to his royal master any words, or any sounds reasonably like words, which they might utter. The king thought that, of course, the children would talk in due time, and that, as they would not have been taught to speak in any one tongue in preference to any other, the first words which they would naturally use would be found to belong to that original language of which he was in search. The two unconscious philologists, meanwhile, were suckled by goats, as no woman could be trusted to be silent before them. The trusty peasant one day entered the room where his charges were kept, when they immediately ran up to him, and, clasping his knees with their hands, lisped out the word "Becos." The matter was reported to the king. He made diligent inquiry amongst men of every nation, and at length discovered that in the Phrygian language "becos" meant "bread." So his Majesty was satisfied that, of all the languages in the world, that spoken by the Phrygians was the oldest.

Let us imagine that, in the present day, some Oriental potentate should wish to discover the best possible form in which the English language could be spoken. Let us suppose him to be animated by not less than the usual respect which foreigners feel for Her Britannic Majesty's English; but let us remember that he cannot have failed to observe that a large portion of Her Britannic Majesty's subjects are in the constant habit of falling away into that species of grammatical dissent which is technically known as "Slang."

The Oriental potentate, under these circumstances, perhaps tries a similar experiment to that which silenced the doubts of the ancient Egyptian. He secures, let us say, the valuable services of two young Englishmen. He intrusts them to the care of a confidential servant, who has orders to volunteer no remarks to them and to answer none of their questions. All books, newspapers, and letters are to be kept sedulously out of their reach. They are permitted to play neither cards nor chess; every species of amusement which could possibly suggest a topic for conversation is denied to them. Their royal entertainer is firmly convinced that, when at last all restraints are removed from them, and they are encouraged to speak, he will instantly discover how the English language may be best and most respectably spoken. He tries the experiment, and the result is, that he is henceforward a stanch believer in the primacy of slang. He visits his captives; he inquires of them as to how they have passed their time, and he is told that they have found it "awfully slow."

Without going so far as to assert that slang is everything that could be wished, it will probably be safe to say that slang nowadays is a very considerable fact. It is a fact which has had a past, and which will assuredly have a future. Our ancestors used words in jest which we use in earnest; many a chance expression, uttered carelessly long ago, has since found a place in our dictionaries.

In days to come, the low-born phrases which are now looked down upon by believers in etymological caste, may be elevated and ennobled; the suspected vocabulary which now enjoys at best a Bohemian existence, may be received into grammatical society. There are instances of words which were contemptuously rejected upon their first appearance, but which have lived to triumph over their detractors, who died unknown. A man must have made for himself a distinguished reputation in some department of science or of art, before he can venture with any safety to throw discredit upon the study of that which may yet become the very language in which posterity will criticise his achievements. The study of language is an integral and essential part of the study of character: we must not acquit or condemn either a nation or an individual until we have heard what they have severally to say for themselves. Is it too much to ask for a few moments of time, and a few pages of type, for the brief examination of an institution so important in its effects and so universal in its influence as slang? It is a fact, and therefore should be acknowledged; it is a custom, and therefore may be criticised; it is a science, and therefore shall be discussed.

It would not be easy, within the limits to which a magazine article is necessarily confined, to do anything like full justice to a subject upon which much has been said and more remains to say. It may perhaps suffice that the question of slang should be here regarded, not generally, but in one of its particular manifestations. Such a method of considering the subject will certainly contract the sphere of our inquiries; but, on the other hand, it will materially enhance their interest. The mass of readers, as a rule, do not care to have a problem or a theory considered wholly from a cosmopolitan point of view: a little judicious bias or prejudice on the part of an author tends to make his work at least more popular. A "History of European Morals" is a more readable book than a "History of Human Morals" would be; and perhaps it is safe to assert that a "History of London Morals" would have a larger sale than either.

Many a Cockney who would care nothing about the mysteries of the metropolis in general, would yet take the greatest delight in being initiated into the smaller secrets of Grosvenor Square. There is, upon this principle, a certain amount of excuse for the writer who shirks the enormous difficulty of an essay upon the whole subject of slang, and who confines himself to treating of one particular representative department. The question then arises, Where is this representative department to be found? Some species of slang will be, from their very nature, excluded from our discussion; there is no need, for example, of a disquisition upon that particular form of complimentary address which is commonly known as "Billingsgate." There can be not much doubt, again, as to the inutility of criticising theatrical slang, cricketing, and all other athletic slang, or, in fact, of noticing any set of expressions which are merely technical and naturally connected with some special profession or practice. The only language which deserves consideration from a social point of view is the language used in society; and if the field of inquiry, even after having been so restricted, should appear yet too wide for a necessarily hurried investigation, such a portion of it should be selected as shall fairly represent the whole. The upper classes of English society appear to be fairly represented by those of their members who are at the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. Cambridge and Oxford may be said to be socially and intellectually typical of young England, and a paper upon "Oxford Slang," or upon "Cambridge Slang," will probably suffice as a specimen essay upon the slang of all male society. A lady has no slang of her own, but she is generally content to borrow from her brother and his friends. Even, however, if there were a set of slang expressions sacred to female use, it might be more convenient to discuss them under the general head of "Ladies' Conversation." The present article shall devote itself to the exclusive consideration of "Oxford Slang" as spoken in our own day. The writer would preliminarily impress two points upon the attention of his readers. Firstly, he does not wish to be accused of having expressed any opinion concerning the advantages or disadvantages of slang as an institution; he simply accepts it as a fact. Secondly, he does not pretend to any special acumen or peculiar information which might give his criticisms an extrinsic value; he desires to approach his subject modestly and tentatively, as a man should do who is a searcher after, and not an expounder of, the truth.

Oxford slang may be divided into two classes: there is the slang of the place, and there is the slang of the people. A discussion of the former class will constitute no part of the ensuing inquiry; expressions which have merely a local interest, or which are representative only of university customs, may be allowed to pass without examination. It is tion of the fact that an undergraduate calls his first and last university examinations, respectively, "smalls" and "greats"; or to assign any historical or etymological origin to the expressions, "ploughed," "gulfed," and the like. These figures of speech, and such as these, relate simply to the essential part of university life; and they cannot be considered as likely to influence in any way the slang of non-university society. When, however, we come to the latter of the two classes into which Oxford slang was above divided, we shall perhaps find our subject devoid neither of interest nor instruction. An average Oxford undergraduate probably uses more slang of a certain kind, in a given time, than any other human being. No matter what sort of conversational tune he may be playing he keeps his slang-stop always pulled out. Repartee, more or less brilliant, is universally the mode in young Oxford. Everybody contributes his share to the common stock of verbal pleasantry which is uninterruptedly kept up from generation to generation.

A man in society nowadays, though he may not have sufficient wit, has at any rate sufficient memory, to make him amusing. If an undergraduate be blessed with no original sources of social merriment, he has but to fill up certain conversational formulas which have become part of undergraduate language, and he may well pass muster. This system of being funny according to formulas is one of the most important elements in the slang of Oxford; and at the same time it is one of the most difficult to describe. We shall perhaps best explain our meaning by giving an instance of this patented jocularity. When a man sees that anything worthy of more than ordinary remark is happening, in which he is in any way connected, he explains his astonishment as a species of covetousness, and instantly "troubles" his neighbor for the object which has caused the excitement: for example, if he sees his friend with a startlingly good, or bad, meerschaum, he says, "Oh! I'll trouble you for your pipe!" If he thinks that the weather is excessively warm, he exclaims, "Oh! I'll trouble you for the heat!" This, strangely enough, is almost identical with the modern formula of the London street-boys, "I'll have your hat!" If we compare the two expressions, we notice that Oxford has perhaps the advantage in point of politeness; but that, on the other hand, the London phrase is the better one, as admitting of a less frequent application. Nothing can be more nauseous than to be obliged to listen continually to the conversation of a man who "troubles" you at every turn. Unfortunately, many of the slang expressions which are heard mainly or exclusively from Oxford men are available for such a constant use, that one soon grows tired of them. To many readers, however, the following specimens, taken at random from the slang which is most in vogue at Oxford at present, may be sufficiently new to be interesting.

A man is said to be "in the swim" when any piece of good fortune has happened, or seems likely to happen, to him. To have rowed one's College-boat to the head of the river, — to have made a good book on the Derby, — are any of them sufficient to have put one "in the swim." The metaphor is piscatorial, "swim" being the term applied by Thames fishermen to those sections of the river which are especially frequented by fish. The an-sport, whereas his neighbor at a little distance may not have a nibble, being "out of the swim."

No more cruel fate can happen to an undergraduate than to be "out of it." This is a phrase of very general application. A man who is unwell, unhappy, in debt, or in any other respect uncomfortable, considers himself, generally, as "out of it." It never occurs to him to say what he is "out of." If this expression could be proved to have been derived from the one which we noticed first, then "out of it" would only mean "out of the swim." But this is not likely. Probably the phrase belongs primarily to cricketers, who alternately have an innings and are "out."

At the time when the Pall Mall Gazette was startling everybody with its revelations about "A night in a work-house," an adjective, then very much in people's mouths, acquired at Oxford a special meaning which it never had before. Since that date, no worse compliment can be applied to anything than to say that it is "casual."

There is another adjective something like the last in meaning, which may deserve a notice here, although it is used at perhaps no more than one or two colleges in Oxford. This is the word "gruttish," derived from the substantive "grut." Its origin is very unique. A few years ago it was the fashion in a certain set for a man to hail his friend with a greeting of "Here comes the great So-and-so!" The word "great," in the uncouth pronunciation of some rustic freshman, became corrupted into "grut." Nowadays, "gruttish" means boorish, and a "grut" is a bore.

Anything which is not "casual" and not "gruttish" is said to be "in good form." Originally, perhaps, "good form" was the aim of boating men only; but the expression has now attained a much wider signification. We may define a man who is always "in good form" in very much the same terms in which a well-bred man has been happily defined: he is one whom one likes at first sight, and whom one does not cease to like until he does something bad enough to make one alter one's opinion of him.

The word "bosh," as almost synonymous with the word "rubbish," is well known. Oxford claims the credit of having invented the verb "to bosh." Its meaning is much the same as that of the kindred verb "to hustle." "Boshing" a man is perhaps more violent than simply "hustling" him. Both verbs, however, mean something like to "balk," to "annoy," or (when applied to things) to "spoil." For instance, you "hustle" a man by being rude to him; you "bosh" his joke by refusing to laugh at it; you "bosh" his chance of sleep by playing upon the cornet all night in the room next to him. The slang use of the verb "to hustle" is evidently only metaphorical, from the physical to the moral world. The other explains itself.

One is said to "score off," or to "notch," any person over whom one obtains any advantage either in word or deed. To make a successful repartee to a friend's remark is to "score off" him; to secure for one's self that comfortable seat by the fire, for which you know that another man has been waiting, is to "notch" him. This, of course, is a metaphor taken from any game in which each point gained from one's adversary is "scored" or "notched" for one's self.

When a man has told, let us say, some story which has not had the intended comic effect, or when he is in any other way conscious of an involuntary baldness in what he has just said, he helps out the deficiencies in his remarks by affecting suddenly to remember that he has only been quoting, and he instantly adds the pretended author's name. Thus, one may often hear, in undergraduates' society at Oxford, such an observation as, "Pass the wine, please. Shakspeare." Such a form of witticism may have been at first intended as a satire upon the system which attaches increasing importance to extreme accuracy, and which demands chapter and verse for every remark, and a raison d'être for everything.

A very common method of "boshing" a man's pun is to explain, sarcastically, and as it were for the benefit of the bystanders, the way in which it has evidently been made. Supposing that somebody in a company of undergraduates is talking, for example, of the Irish Church Question, and tries the hackneyed experiment of being funny about the "Bill" and the abbreviated Christian name of the present Premier, his neighbor will perhaps exclaim, "Yes! I see it!" and then kindly announce to the company, "Play on the word Bill!" This joke is sometimes put in a more abstruse form. If a witty remark is made, let us say, about port wine, some one says, "Play on the word sherry!" or in some other way intimates that he appreciates the joker's intention to be amusing rather than his success. Of course this is always done in the most perfect good temper.

The last expression on our list is one which has never quite succeeded in establishing itself as a genuine piece of Oxford slang. One may occasionally hear a man say that he intends to "have a crib on" to do so and so. By this he means that he will make up a quiet party to do whatever he has mentioned. For example, "to have a crib on" to go to the Derby, is to arrange a comfortable (perhaps a clandestine) trip to see the race. "Crib," in fact, is slang for sanctum. A man who has a sanctum can please himself as to whom he shall admit into it; a man who "has a crib on" will take care that no outsider is let in.

In conclusion, we need offer no apology to our readers for having treated of such unimportant details as the above. The name prefixed to this essay was a warning that nothing very serious was to be expected. We crave, however, the indulgence of two classes of society: we hope that ladies will forgive us if we have been dull, and that Oxford undergraduates will not be hard upon us, even although we should in some fashion have broken trust.

CANADIAN MUFFINS.

LOOKING over some back numbers of a comic paper, I came across a list of the wonders of the day, and amongst various subjects of the writer's speculation, noticed one particularly, which was, — "Wonder when the Yankees will take Canada?" "Wonder what a Canadian Muffin is like?" The first question must be left for the consideration of those acquainted with Yankee politics and Yankee impudence, but perhaps a winter spent with the Muffins may enable me to give some information concerning the second.

Before embarking for Canada, varied and interesting were the accounts I received of the caribbo shooting, the sleighing, the skating, and, above all, the "Muffining," to be obtained therein. Men gravely declared that if any young lady, not previously engaged, of course, found favor in your sight, you were at liberty then and there to constitute her your "Muffin," which, being interpreted, signified that by entering into such an arrangement, you might walk, ride, or drive tête-à-tête with her; that you had the entrée of her parents' house, those parents at the same time keeping obligingly in the background; that at balls, no ill-natured remarks were made by even the most virulent old maids when you danced every dance together, and, finally, — wherein lies the cream of the whole thing, — the usual English wind-up of such an extensive flirtation was by no means a necessity.

No lynx-eyed mamma was supposed to be ready to pounce upon you for trifling with her daughter's affections; no truculent father was to hint darkly at an action for B. O. P. No, nothing of such a disagreeable nature was to take place. On your return to England, goodbys were said, with regret doubtless, but still as a matter of course; and even if a change of Muffins were deemed advisable, nothing was easier than to subside into terms of ordinary friendship with your old flame. Verily, this Canada seemed to be a land of promise.

On the voyage out, however, these Utopian prospects faded somewhat. Fellow-passengers, who had sojourned before in North America, admitted that there were traditions of a golden age, in which Muffins were supposed to have existed, but added, that this happy era had long passed away, and that the manners and customs of the belles Canadiennes of the present did not differ much from those of the girls we left behind us.

We arrived at Quebec about the middle of June, and found it like a city of the dead, as every one who could possibly get away had fled from the heat to the watering-places, far down the St. Lawrence, or as the vernacular of the country would express it, "all the first families had gone to the salt water till the fall." The fall, i. e. autumn, came at last, and with it the return of the beau-monde of Quebec. Very soon it was apparent that my companions of the voyage out had been correct enough, and that the land of the Muffins knew them no more.

Perhaps in Canadian society, the laws of etiquette are not quite so rigid as at home, and occasionally a tinge of barbarism is met with that is rather refreshing, but that is all. The girls are perfectly innocent of the free-and-easy ways ascribed to them in England, and are quite as shy as the most far-seeing of London rosebuds of entering into any flirtation that does not promise a satisfactory and definite termination.

There is a very well-authenticated story of a member of one of our crackest regiments, coming out, imbued with similar notions to mine, and innocently suggesting to his partner at a ball that she should be his Muffin for the winter. Long will it be ere that gallant officer forgets with what speechless scorn and astonishment his offer was received.

Indeed, above all other words in the language, the ladies of Canada detest that of "Muffin." It is a perfect abomination unto them. I remember at some amateur theatricals got up by the garrison, when the heroine of the piece, whose father objected to the course of true love running smooth, exclaimed, that she hoped that remorse for his cruelty might oppress his soul like :—

"Unpaid income tax, or luscious muffin!"

Lo! the buzz of laughter and approbation which had hitherto been most frequent, suddenly ceased, and a solemn and ominous silence pervaded the audience.

Nor do the mammas differ materially from our English mothers. They show the same laudable desire to have their daughters settled in life, and the same skill in effecting their purpose. In fact, some of the matronly anglers at home might take a few lessons with advantage from their Canadian sisters in the art, so deftly do the latter throw their fly, and so promptly do they strike their fish if he venture on the slightest rise. Few there are who escape such able handling, if once hooked. Of course there have been exceptions, — amongst which was one especially notable, where the prey slipped back into deep water at the moment when the landing-net, in the shape of a wedding-ring, was on the point of encircling him; for the gentleman made his escape so narrowly that he was smoking a cigar on the quarter-deck of the mail steamer as she glided down the St. Lawrence, whilst his marriage-bells were ringing in the town above. Disgusted indeed must have been the poor fiancée, when she found that her marriage chimes, instead of summoning the true, had only rung out the false.

Before launching forth into Canadian society, it is wise to prepare a stock of small talk — the smaller the better, — and exclusively confined to the somewhat narrow scope of the gossip of the town in which you are. If you venture upon books, attempt nothing more than the merest sensation novels, or you will have your companion's pretty eyes gazing upon you with an utterly bewildered expression, and you will arrive at the unpleasant conclusion that she is thinking you an awful bore, and is probably sighing after Mr. Brainless, a young gentleman fresh from school, and whom you superciliously regard as an insufferable cub.

One of the belles of Quebec, last season, — and a very pretty girl she was, too, — was standing in a crowded ball-room with a partner who prided himself not a little on his Italian accent. Having struggled for some time in vain to get out of the press into a cooler atmosphere, he gave up the attempt, saying, —

"Lasciate ogni speranza, voi ch'entrare," as Dante remarks."

"Dante? Who is Dante? — he is not in society, is he?" inquired the fair damsel.

The little world of Quebec presents one very curious feature, in consequence of being composed of two parts, — English and French, — who are almost equal in number, and who, though strictly preserving their nationalities in language and habits, form one society and always seem to maintain the most peaceful and friendly relations with each other. By the way, the French part of the community received a terrible shock a few days ago, when their archbishop issued a stern edict from the pulpit, forbidding any member of his flock to take part in round dances. The good father scarcely acted wisely, for his pretty lambs apparently cannot bear to witness the valse, in which they may no longer join, and hide their disappointment in nooks and obscure corners of the stairs, whither they are invariably accompanied by their former partners, — a method of procedure which seems by no means to meet the approval of their chaperones.

It would be very unfair to conclude this brief sketch without a glance at the Canadian girls' accomplishments. Their capacity for amusement is immense. They delight in getting up "tobogganing parties, the object of which consists in sliding down, at the pace of an express, steep inclines of hard snow, eighty or a hundred feet high, seated on a strip of birch-bark. Balls they revel in; indeed, so devoted are they to dancing, that when there is no regular party going on, some one sends round and asks friends to drop in after dinner, and a little dance is improvised, which is quite as pleasant as a more formal affair. Lastly, let us pay homage to their greatest charm of all, — their skating. A man who was rather fascinated by a little colonist, whom he feared would scarcely be greeted with open arms by his friends at home, said to me, "You see, old fellow, if I could only introduce her to my people when she is cutting an 8 backwards, I'd propose to her like a shot."

Standing on the platform, which surrounds the "ruck," and watching a crowd of pretty girls in the most piquant of fur caps and the nattiest of boots, gliding through a quadrille, or whirling round in a valse, to the music of one of the military bands, is indeed a treat, and you straightway marvel how you could ever have enjoyed, last winter in England, the task of supporting a lady novice, whose ankles persisted in twisting about with a flexibility perfectly appalling, and who every moment made frantic clutches at you, which usually resulted in a general downfall.

There is, moreover, a vitality and a piquancy about the "Muffins" which take the place of the superior education of England; and the kindness and hospitality shown by the natives, old and young, to any strangers, especially if they hail from the old country, will amply recompense the trouble and discomfort of a voyage across the Atlantic.

AUNT SALLY'S ACCOUNT OF THE TIDAL WAVE.

I.

I AM not more nervous than other people. Some men seem to be afraid of nothing, and some women impudent enough for anything, but often timid when terrible events occur. I live a lonely life, though not quite alone, as I have a younger sister living with me, and a brother, — if such living as he gives can be considered an abode. Dolphin Row, Dawlish, is to him a resting-place when cash is low, and other residences have lost their charm, and here he has come lately to see what he termed "Saxby's Lark," or "The Old Girl Engulfed."

Now, as I said before, I am not more nervous than other people. Still, I own that living in Dolphin Row, under the great red cliffs and on the beach of Dawlish, made me interested in Mr. (Captain?) Saxby's predictions, and I have very diligently perused my Times, so as to gain information for and against the probability of this beautiful village and Dolphin Row being destroyed. Mr. Saxby seemed to me to have the best of the argument, and was sure to be right if the wind blew hard, and the sea rose; so I read and trembled. My sister is not only younger, but given to sneering, frivolity, and High Churchism, and so afforded me little comfort, — indeed, I may say none at all; whilst Alfred, the brother, was little less than brutal with what he calls "chaff," and I term "slang."

How he or another could see anything like fun, or a "lark," in the approach of a huge wave, striding on to our beach and engulfing old maids, or even some of those things walking past our windows with chignons (termed "chigs" by them), more like mop-tops than hair, and dresses disgustingly tight and short, is more than I can imagine? But men are seldom pleasant (some clergy may be, and I once knew a doctor so), and if the world were sought for a selfish, inconsiderate, unmanageable, unmannerly, unnatural, idle, and disagreeable man, it could not find my brother's equal.

For fear my Times' reading should not have been sufficiently close, Alfred, aided by his sister Harriett, had neglected no opportunity of collecting extracts from other papers; and, of course, these were not of an assuring nature. I think those from the Standard (Alfred profanely calls that delightful journal "Mrs. Gamp") gave me the most severe shocks. They were more positive as to our being submerged; and loving and trusting the Standard, and knowing Mr. Saxby had been employed teaching people all about the sun and moon, I prepared for the worst.

Dolphin Row is a very beautiful row, commanding an extensive view over the sad sea-wave; but it is not the row a person would care to live in when tidal waves are roaming about. I should say, by the pebbles and sand in the little bit of garden in front of our house, that formerly this must have been sea-beach. Indeed, I do not see why it should not be so still, excepting it is marked off by green palings and the railroad. Report — which is seldom good-natured, but more often malicious — said that last winter, when the railroad was injured by a storm, this row of houses was shaken, and each lower story room turned into sea-baths. This may have been the case; but when we took the house at Lady Day it was not mentioned, and never probably would have been remembered, had not Mr. Saxby so kindly come forward and told us all to beware of stormy weather during the first week in October, and a dreadful wave on the 6th.

Now, I trust, that with a house built upon the sands, not twenty yards from the sea, with a cliff of loose red shingly rock overhanging, without protection of any sort from tidal waves, with a railroad running in front, with a brother and sister collecting horrors, and with my Times, Standard, and Mr. Saxby, I may be excused for timidity before and up to the eventful 6th of October. I dare say some will "pooh-pooh," and appear very valiant now; but this I know, that up to the 6th I had many sympathizers, and not a few were prepared to do what Alfred terms "cut and run" as soon as they decently could after the Michaelmas quarter. Even the Government officers, putting economy aside for the time being, put on instead more hands, and did as I did, — prepared for the worst. Yes, as I say, people may laugh now, and some people may write in the Times letters with catchpenny titles, all full of Latin, extracts from journals, and abuse of poor dear Mr. Saxby; but many of these same people were frightened out of their lives, and if Mr. Saxby had been right, then some one would have been wrong.

I did not see that the Times noticed the weather or tides as they occurred at this place on the 6th of October. I presume that paper is too grand to know or care whether we were drowned or remained uninjured. One thing, Dawlish does not care for the Times, and so we are equal. However, through this publication I desire to give the world every information, and will at once say that my esteemed friends, the Standard and Mr. Saxby, were wrong in their predictions. All must occasionally err, and, of course, Mr. Saxby would be less than human, perhaps more than human, were he always right. In this instance he was certainly misinformed. The elements may have played him falsely, or his calculations may have been made on incorrect data (that is the grand word, I believe); but be it how you will, poor dear Mr. Saxby, and my much-trusted Standard, shook my nerves for nothing. The day commenced with a calm and a fog. The sea behaved as usual. The sun cleared away the fog, and with a little chilliness from an easterly wind the sun set and left Dawlish to breathe freely once again.

I have always considered people presumptuous who seek danger, and not being desirous of seeing poor Mr. Saxby's prophecy fulfilled, I had arranged to spend the day on higher ground: not to make a continuous picnic of it, and breakfast, luncheon, and dine with the spiders, under the blackberry bushes on our cliffs, but simply to go to a friend's house, and together watch events.

How I got there, and what came of it, must be reserved for another chapter.

II.

Had I not made an appointment to spend the day with my esteemed friend, Mrs. Soursides, I certainly should not have remained in the house at Dolphin Row. Dear Mr. Saxby had pointed out to me the danger of such a proceeding; for though his letter was addressed principally to mariners, whom he warned against the influence of the sun and moon on the earth's equator, still, he ominously referred to ill-built sea-walls, and I have very little doubt but that the sea-wall dividing that horrid railway from the raging sea is badly built. Any way, it was a risk remaining in Dolphin Row; and if the sea-wall were washed away, who would answer for our houses not going too,—or, at least, the possibility of finding a great hissing engine, its tender, the driver, stoker, guard, and, perhaps, all the passengers, floating about in the drawing-room? Added to this, Alfred and his sister had been ruder than usual overnight, forcing what Alfred called "grief statistics" down my throat, until the time arrived for his usual disappearance billiard-room ways.

When Alfred is annoyed, or is approaching the limit of his stay "at home," he seldom addresses me as "Sarah," or even the more familiar "Sally." It becomes that odious "Aunt Sally." And, on this night previous to poor Mr. Saxby's failure, hardly a sentence did he utter without calling my attention to his remarks by prefixing or affixing this disagreeable name.

"Good night, Aunt Sally. Perhaps this may be the last time we shall ever wish each other good night," said the man, rising to leave for his haunts, and treating the solemn subject with fearful levity.

"Good night," I replied, with dignity, and trusted he would soon be gone, and not make the house smell so dreadfully from his horrid cigar lit at the candles on the piano.

"Look here, aunt. If old Saxby's right, and you go up a tree" (he meant he drowned), "don't forget to leave me a lock of your hair," was his next remark, continuing to fill the room with tobacco-smoke.

"Mr. Saxby will be sure to be right. I wish you would go away, and not laugh at things you cannot understand," was my reply.

"Well, it is a shame to laugh at a thing one cannot understand," was his immediate retort; and leaving the room as he spoke, I had no opportunity of ascertaining whether "the thing" not to be understood was poor dear Mr. Saxby or myself. I know he meant something personal by his sneering tone, and by the look of self-laudation which he gave to his sister Harriett.

Harriett appreciated the joke, if such were there, and little else occurred until, as we parted for the night, I informed her of my intention to spend all the morrow at "The Eagle's Nest," the residence of my esteemed friend, Mrs. Soursides.

"That is fine. I wish Alfred had known it," remarked my sister, and we wished each other good night.

It was very early in the morning when I left Dolphin Row. I wished to have much of dear Mrs. Soursides's society, and also to be on the higher ground. I thought that perhaps poor Mr. Saxby might have made a mistake about the hour of the sun and moon being on the equator, and then the railway-wall would be washed away, and the train come into the drawing-room before the proper time.

I do not think Mrs. Soursides expected me so early; at least, she did not seem to have given her servants notice of my coming to breakfast, because the housemaid could never have been so rude and vulgar to me had she been previously prepared for my advent. The woman at once guessed part of my object in coming, and after snapping me up, when I asked if her mistress was at home, by saying, "Of course she is, and in bed, where other ladies ought to be too," added, "I suppose, mum, you thought to get out of being drowned by coming on here?"

"I came to see your mistress. Do not let me disturb you. Go on with your work," was my reply, and said in a most kindly tone.

"Thank you, mum. There is n't a room ready for you, mum. Perhaps, mum, you would n't mind taking a walk to the beach until the breakfast things is laid, and master is down," said the woman, giggling.

Having just left the beach, I was not going to return there, but felt very uncertain how to act. Mr. Soursides's being at home was an unexpected shock, as I had been given to understand that he could not possibly return from conducting some legal business in town before the end of the month; but having accepted an invitation to breakfast, and also having on the night before told Harriett of the same, it would never have done now to return to Dolphin Row.

Whilst remaining thus in doubt, I overheard the housemaid inform Mr. Soursides of my having called, and think her statement called forth something not unlike an expletive from that man, and an inquiry as to "What the devil does she want?"

"She said, sir, she was come to spend the day. I think, sir, she's afraid of this big wave as is coming, and come here to be safe," replied the hypocritical minx, mincing her words as if she were some one quite grand.

I did not hear what followed very distinctly, as I walked away as fast as I could. Mr. Soursides muttered something about having breakfast sharp, as he had to be off, and then seemed to talk to himself about "old cats," whilst he walked up and down on the gravel-drive.

I watched the sea for at least half an hour, and then ventured once again to lift the knocker of "The Eagle's Nest."

Dear Mrs. Soursides was down, looking — as she always does, and ever will do — perfectly charming, and received me most kindly. Mr. Soursides is never pleasant, and generally cynical. Being a lawyer, he delights in putting everybody in a witness-box, and ascertaining a reason for everything.

"I am so glad you have come. Do come up stairs and take your things off. The coffee has only just been made. We had almost given you up," said dear Mrs. Soursides.

"Speak for yourself, my dear. Dolphin Row is not the pleasantest part of Dawlish, if Saxby proves a prophet," said Mr. Soursides, as he put aside the newspaper and coldly bade me welcome.

Breakfast was not a pleasant meal, although dear Mrs. Soursides did her best to be agreeable, and to calm my fears as to passing sounds.

"How did you leave all at home? Quite well, I hope," asked dear Mrs. Soursides.

"Quite well, thank you," I replied, trying to collect my thoughts, which were disturbed by the rumbling of a passing wagon, which might have been poor Mr. Saxby's wave.

"The gratitude for the inquiry must be great. Did they insist on remaining to be drowned?" asked Mr. Soursides.

"They only laugh at the wave, sir; and, sorry as I should be were they drowned, I cannot but think it would serve them right," was my reply.

"What! for laughing at the waves, or at Mr. Saxby? Scant justice you ladies would dole out, I fear," said Mr. Soursides, looking over the edge of the horrid Times newspaper.

"O, what is that? Is it the wave?" I asked, as there was a dreadful bump somewhere.

"Don't be nervous, dear. I think it is Susan throwing the fire-irons down in the drawing-room," said dear Mrs. Soursides, trying to reassure me.

"Perhaps it is friend Saxby arrived to see his wave, and the coastguard are saluting him," suggested Mr. Soursides.

"Perhaps it is no such thing. I thought you were obliged to go to Exeter to-day," said dear Mrs. Soursides, sharply.

Mr. Soursides took the hint, and, greatly to our relief, was soon after out of the house.

It seemed a long time until luncheon. Perhaps waiting and watching the tide made the hours pass slowly; still, with the exception of terrible anxiety, chiefly caused by Susan, who appeared to insist on being more noisy than usual, time was not passed very unpleasantly. Dear Mrs. Soursides knew all about everybody, and she told me the real truth about numbers of the people we always meet. Then we talked about what the Standard said, and what a nice paper it was for news about all the dreadful things going on every day, and how wrong it was of the Times to let people put in letters abusing Mr. Saxby. After this we tried to work, but as it was time for the wave we could not do much. It was just then I thought I should have fainted, for, as we were both looking out at the sea, that horrid Susan banged the door, and then screamed out, "Lunch is ready, ma'am!"

"Is it the wave?" I asked, tremblingly.

"Lor' no, miss! The wave's done coming, and the coastguards say it were all stuff," said Susan, sneeringly.

Mrs. Soursides led the way to the dining-room, and it was not until after two glasses of sherry that I was quite myself again. I might have been disappointed at the wave not coming. I might have been sorry for poor Mr. Saxby, but Susan's noise at the door, and then her dreadful impertinences, quite upset me. To tell me that common coastguard-people knew as much as Mr. Saxby, and considered his predictions as stuff!

Certainly the sea did not behave differently from usual during the afternoon, and, seeing all things so safe, I was prepared to return to Dolphin Row; but dear Mrs. Soursides was so pressing that I was induced to remain for dinner, and thus foolishly rendered myself liable to be again insulted by Mr. Soursides. The horrid Chinese gong sounding the dress-bell, recalled my memory for the moment to poor Mr. Saxby and the wave; but its unearthly clamor being explained, I proceeded to dear Mrs. Soursides's boudoir, and by seven o'clock descended to the drawing-room.

"Hallo, Aunt Sally! How does the world fare with your Saxby and the sad sea's wave?" was my brother's salutation.

"I did not expect to see you here," I replied.

"Rather the contrary, — drowned?" said Mr. Soursides, who had asked him to dinner.

"Dinner is on the table, sir," said the parlor-maid, interrupting that man's sneering remarks; and accepting his arm, I went into the dining-room.

The dinner was made a very unpleasant meal. Alfred and Mr. Soursides did little else than refer to poor Mr. Saxby's failure, whilst dear Mrs. Soursides repeatedly remonstrated with her husband for his rudeness in not considering my feelings; and I was not sorry when it was over, and I was once more safely at home in Dolphin Row.

OUR SECRET SOCIETY.

A REMINISCENCE OF THE "COUP-D'ÉTAT."

I.

THIS was in 1851.

There were six of us who formed a club which met on Sunday and Thursday evenings to discuss the inalienable rights of man and to drink beer. We were all under twenty; and as we none of us had a single sixpence, we were the more persuaded that the existing allotment of property amongst mankind was defective, and that an immediate redistribution was urgent. We had, indeed, a whole scheme of our own for the reorganization of humanity and the improving of it. In the first place there were to be no more kings or taxes. All the world was to be a great Republic, governed by a cosmopolitan parliament sitting at Paris, and elected by universal suffrage, every man and woman in the universe having a vote. As a natural consequence of this state of things, frontiers, armies, and custom-houses were to be abolished; and, as it was evident that prisons and policemen were obstacles to the moral development of a free people, prisons and policemen were to be done away with, and every man was to be at liberty to take care of himself. The only point upon which we differed somewhat was the land question: one of our number, whose father had a farm in Brittany, objecting strongly to the idea of a general confiscation. But the remaining five of us, whose fathers had no farms in Brittany, overruled this objection, explaining that under the new system everybody would have a farm, or, if he preferred, the value of it in money. Upon this assurance our colleague became pacified.

We called ourselves the "HEXAMETRON," not, as Horace Toupie, the wag of our set, remarked, because the height of the whole six of us, placed one on the top of the other, would have just towered to six metres; but because we were six in number, and because we had chosen for our motto an hexameter of Lucan's, — by which we meant to imply that our fellow-beings generally were grovelling in darkness, and that it was the mission of us six to enlighten them. Our watch-cry was the word METRON! which we used to pronounce on entering the room where we were going to deliberate. As we were all six perfectly well known to one another, and as it would therefore have been slightly difficult for any stranger to introduce himself into our midst without attracting attention, this formality may seem like an excess of caution. But it is impossible to be too prudent; and so, whenever we turned the handle of the door, we cried “Metron!” mysteriously, and were answered by the word “Heza!” which was taken in this particular case to mean “All right!”

We held our councils at the “Café Rousseau,” within a stone's-throw of the Panthéon, and we had selected Thursday and Sunday as our nights, to suit the convenience of one of our number who was at the Military School of Saint Cyr, and who came to Paris on those days for a holiday. Our practice was to meet at five and to dine all together at a students' table-d'hôte, kept by a republican old person named Madame Riquie. After dinner we adjourned to the café aforesaid and debated treasonably over a jug of Strasburg ale. At ten we marched off in a body for the station, to see our friend the Saint-Cyrian return by train to his school.

He was a strong, pleasant fellow was this Saint-Cyrian, and would have done wonders on a barricade. He was studying for the Cavalry, and when he walked down the narrow streets of the Quartier Latin, his bright, handsome face smiling under his blue shako, and his steel scabbard clanking on the pavement, the grisettes turned round to look at him and the old women on the doorsteps muttered, “Sainte Vierge! quel joli garçon!” It is not often one finds a future dragoon mixed up with a scheme for abolishing standing armies, doing away with taxes, and proclaiming universal brotherhood; but Louis de Crème was an enthusiast. He was the son of a Legitimist count, who had died whilst Louis was a child and left him to be brought up by two maiden aunts strongly devoted to the Bourbons, the Pope, and the reverend Society of Jesuits. Between them both these excellent people had made the life of the young Louis hideous to him. Twice a week, and on the vigils of saints' days, they required him to fast. Five times a year — on the anniversaries of the deaths of Louis XVI. and of Marie Antoinette, on the birthday of Louis Philippe, on the anniversary of his Orleanist Majesty's accession, and on the 29th of July, date of the fall of Charles X. — they arrayed him in black clothes and set him to recite the seven penitential psalms in Latin. Once a twelvemonth, on the 15th July, feast of St. Henry, his tutor, a beetle-browed disciple of Ignatius Loyola, dictated to him a letter containing assurances of fealty towards “Henri V.” The young count was made to sign himself “your Majesty's most faithful, loyal, and humble servant”; and the epistle, along with a few score others coming from different parts of France, went its way per post to Frohsdorf. The ineradicable impression left in the mind of the young Louis by a few years of this training was that his Royal Highness the Count of Chambord was a variety of the Ghoul species, and that the reverend congregation of Jesuits formed part of the genus Bogey. From hearing himself constantly addressed as “Monsieur le Comte” by a gray-headed retainer in an out-of-date livery, and from being unceasingly reminded by his aunts that his lordly dignity rendered it binding upon him to despise the rest of human-kind, he acquired a hearty loathing for titles, which revealed itself by furtive gnashing of teeth and muttered imprecations against escutcheons and coronets. When the Revolution of 1848 broke out and reduced him to the condition of simple citizen, he indulged in unseemly rejoicing. To the speechless dismay of his tutor, Father Pinceau, he purchased a red nightcap for fifty sous, and rushed out into the streets with it upon his head to sing the Marseillaise and cheer the Provisional Government. When he returned home at night, after a day spent in this fashion, he found the old retainer François, his two aunts, and the reverend Father Pinceau, haggard with anxiety; and, in truth, he looked a strange figure. His clothes were torn, his hands and face were muddy, his head was bleeding from a blow he had received in a scuffle with some Orleanist officers in the Place du Carrousel, and in addition to all this he was merry with wine. “O Monsieur le Comte!” exclaimed the astonished François. “There are no more counts now!” answered the young republican. “I am the Citizen Louis Crème, and you are the Citizen François. We are both equal. Here, shake hands with me, and let us kiss each other.”

He was sixteen when he said this, and his two aunts, the Demoiselles de Crème de la Crèmerie, piously resolved to disinherit him. They gave him a last chance by offering him forgiveness on condition that he would go to Rome and take service for three years in the Pontifical army (for the Romans were beginning to simmer, and his Holiness, like many other potentates at that time, was feeling nervous); but the young Louis demurred so unequivocally to this project that the Demoiselles de la Crème saw it was useless to hold parley with him. They told him that he should choose his own profession, and that they would support him until he was twenty-one. Louis chose the French army, in the hope that the Republic would last, and that there would be a war with Russia to free the Poles. He was accordingly sent to Saint Cyr, and was still there awaiting his epaulet of sub-lieutenant at the time of which I am writing, in 1851.

The other members of the Hexameton were, M. Horace Toupie, a student of medicine, already designated as the wag of our company; Hugues Cascarot and Maximilien Destouffes, students of law; Camille Lange, a poet and journalist; and myself, a painter. I don't believe six hearts more blithe and careless, six souls more republican and earnest, six purses more light, or six tongues more defiant, could have been found in the whole of France, from Dunkirk to Bayonne. We deeply hated oppression without quite understanding what it meant, save that in a general way every existing government was oppressive and every man in office an oppressor. We thoroughly abominated everything that was a “sham,” and in this category we included a good number of things, such as decorations, beadies' maces, the titles “Monsieur” and “Madame,” false teeth, wigs, dress-coats, cork-legs, cardinal-archbishops, commissaries of police,

State dignitaries, and hair-dye. We were very fond of workmen, and the more tattered they were the better. If we saw a beggar particularly disreputable in appearance, dirty, slipshod, and out-at-elbows, we seldom had any difficulty in eliciting from him that he was a friend of liberty, that he had been persecuted, and that he wanted a few sous. We always gave him the money, though sometimes it was the last centime we possessed; and we used to look at each other, half crying to think we could not do more. Eh, the generous young fools we were! and how many "friends of liberty" we found on our path, persecuted, out-at-elbows, and ready to strip us of our unsuspecting pennies!

We were very fond of one another, and as much together as hard work would allow. We called each other "tu," of course, and wrote to each other as "Mon frère." We all of us — with the exception of Louis Crème — lived in the same street, that old Rue de l'Ecole de Médecine which nowadays is about all that remains of our cherished Quartier Latin; and we were alike in this point, that having keen appetites for everything that was good, we were obliged to be content with such frugal fare as may be indulged in upon £ 60 a year.

There was one of us, however, who could afford to be a little less self-denying, and that was Camille Lange, the poet and journalist. Just as Louis Crème was the right arm of our society, so Camille Lange was the head and brain of it. He was a slight, fair-headed boy, with a pink girlish face, and hands like those of a woman. But there was the stuff of a young devil in him, and if ever there was a wild break-neck scheme to propose, it was he who proposed it and led the way. There had been some queer and hot street-fights between 1848 and 1851. Many a barricade had risen, stood a siege, and been knocked over in the dust amidst heaps of dead and wounded; but there had scarcely been a single fight in which Camille Lange had not taken part, and if he was not killed fifty times over during the three years, it is probable that Fate, being a woman, had pity on a boy so fair and brave. He never bragged or talked much of his adventures; but he was very proud of a sabre-cut which had almost cloven his left shoulder through, and still prouder, if possible, of a bullet which had broken two of his ribs, and kept him three months in bed. In 1851, aged then nineteen years and a half, he was a writer on the staff of the Pilori, an organ which was earnestly advocating the abolition of everybody. As he wrote very gayly when he pleased, he could have aspired to a higher and less spitfire kind of journal; but it was his firm conviction that the Pilori was the only paper in Europe worth reading, and as he earned about a hundred pounds a year on it by dint of daily contributions, he considered himself abundantly paid, and would have held it treason to desert. He had also written three manuscript volumes of revolutionary poems, with the unobtrusive title of 'Αναβήματα Λαού'; but, as he had not been fortunate enough to find a publisher ambitious of going to prison for six months, these works remained unprinted.

It was Camille Lange who had founded the Hexametron, drawn up its rules, and framed its constitution. The objects he had in view were simple, and were clearly explained in the society's minute-book, on the first page of which was written in good bold text a preamble dated from the "year 60 of the great Republic."*

* The Republican Calendar dated from the 22d September, 1792.

This inspiring document, which proclaimed the fixed determination of the Hexametron to put down the President and to distribute his Civil List amongst the poor, and which, to our thinking, breathed eloquence of no common order, would alone have sufficed to give Camille Lange the leadership of our debates. But he held another and yet better title to the post of chief in that he was the son of a Deputy, of a real Republican Deputy, who speechified, voted, legislated, and had this advantage over many other Deputies, that, when he was excited, his lungs allowed him to make twice more noise than twenty ordinary members put together. His name was Demosthenes Lange, and he was justly proud of having been a blacksmith. When he entered into a conversation with a stranger he never failed to begin with the words, "I, who have been a blacksmith," or, "I, who have wielded the sledge-hammer," suiting, at the same time, the action to the word, and swinging his powerful right arm in a way that made inoffensive people shiver. He was six feet high, proportionably stout, and roared lustily even when saying merely "Good morning." His usual dress was a suit of brown velvet, leather gaiters, and a gray felt hat, which he wore planted firmly on his head, as if he feared to lose it. Under his arm he carried a forbidding-looking staff, which would have cracked the head of an opponent like a nutshell, and kept twenty average Frenchmen at bay. Demosthenes Lange was one of those men who rise to the surface of the social sea after a revolution like the spars of a wreck. Under Louis Philippe he had been the demagogue of his commune, the terror of the mayor, the despair of the curé. He took in the Siècle, read Voltaire, and had tried to bring up his son according to the precepts contained in Rousseau's Emile. He was greatly respected by his fellow-villagers, for he could thrash any half-dozen of them together, and occasionally did so to adjust little differences of opinion. It is known that on one occasion, when the Prefect, the Bishop, and the General of the Division had come to visit the village, Demosthenes Lange had stood in the midst of the road with his arms folded, and without deigning to doff his hat. The Prefect had frowned, the General had grunted, the Bishop had looked at him with surprise, and had then taken the initiative of bowing himself; but the blacksmith had held good, and this noble act of independence had, without doubt, helped considerably to place him at the top of the poll in the popular elections of 1848. On becoming a Deputy, Demosthenes Lange had, of course, given up his forge. He had laid by money enough to give him an income of £400 a year, which, added to the twenty-five francs a day* due to him as a representative, was enough to keep him cosily; the more so as he was a widower, and never gave his son a centime, on the principle that, from sixteen upwards, a boy should take care of himself. Beside him, Camille looked like a small ash-tree in contrast with a big oak. The boy had nothing of his father's looks, and resembled him only in his dogged obstinacy. Camille was as frail in appearance as a young

There are still some determined Radicals in France who insist upon reckoning by it; and there is a newspaper well known as the organ of MM. Victor Hugo, Rochefort, Michelet, and the extreme Republicans, which prints the date on its front page according to this style. Thus, instead of 1st November, 1889, it would write, 10th Brumaire, year 78.

* During the Republic of 1848-51, the Deputies received £1 a day during the session; they now receive an annual salary of £500.

town-bred nobleman. He was well taught, because he had taught himself, and had never been drugged with books that were distasteful to him. It is not sure, however, that his father thought very highly of his capacities. He would have much preferred a son who could have eaten four pounds of beef and drunk a gallon of beer at a sitting. But Camille had the greatest veneration for the ex-blacksmith, whom he compared in his mind to Caius Gracchus and Wat Tyler, and although he seldom saw him, — for Mr. Demosthenes seemed able to get on very well without his son's company, — yet he read his speeches, wrote enthusiastic leaders upon them, and pasted them in a gilt-leaved album, which he read with tears in his eyes.

Somehow, though, Camille had never spoken to his father about the Hexameton, which surprised us rather, for we thought so well of our society that we had more than once proposed that the secret should be revealed to the great tribune, and that he should be asked to become our patron. But Camille had always opposed this notion, either from modesty — as some of us fancied — or from the fear that the powerful demagogue who had openly bearded a Prefect, a General, and a Bishop might despise a league of six striplings who could not so much as have routed twelve coal-heavers between them. "Let us wait," used to say Camille, "until we have done something great and made people talk about us. Then we can hold up our heads, and the representatives of the people will be proud to shake us by the hand." We acquiesced, looking forward confidently to the day when we should have done something else than drink beer; and it is thus that, during the first nine months of our social existence (March to November, 1851), M. Demosthenes Lange never once heard about us.

The day came, however, when, after lying quietly in a corner, — like a forgotten shell on a battlefield, to use the striking image of Horace Toupie, — the Hexameton was destined to explode into deeds of glory which startled, not only Mr. Demosthenes himself, but half the inhabitants of Paris. If you have patience to listen to me, I will tell you how.

II.

Most people will remember that, in the month of November, 1851, the land of France presented the edifying spectacle of a nation being dragged in different directions by four parties pretty equally matched. They were perfectly disinterested, these parties; all they wanted was power and the free disposal of the public funds. They were likewise thoroughly liberal in their intentions, and hated one another heartily as became true Liberals. The party in power was the Purple; the other three were the Red, White, and Blue. Each had had its turn in office; had increased the taxes, distributed patronage amongst its friends, shut up its rivals in prison, and called upon the country to rejoice. Each had, moreover, in its turn been violently unseated by the combined efforts of the remaining three. Thus, at one time, the Red, Blue, and Purple had been in league against the White; after that the White, Red, and Purple had overthrown the Blue; next, the White, Blue, and Purple had slaughtered the Red; and now the Red, White, and Blue were doing their best to annihilate the Purple. The chief of this latter party was a man wise in his generation, an astute politician and a silent.

In 1851 he had been nearly three years in power, and was looking forward with unfeigned regret to the prospect of being soon obliged to cede his place to another. But whilst his adversaries spent their time in braying — and with what vigor they brayed those only can realize who had the privilege of hearing them — the Purple chief worked in quiet for the interest of everybody in general, but more particularly of himself. I forget at what precise time it was that stray rumors of an impending coup-d'état began to pervade the atmosphere; for in Paris we talk of a coup-d'état as men do in other countries of a change of shirt. But gradually these rumors took ground. By degrees it became clear to everybody that, matters fairly considered, a coup-d'état was just the sort of thing one had a right to expect. The only question was, whether the coup-d'état would be an executive or a parliamentary one? whether it would be the Assembly that would suppress the Purple chief, or the Purple chief who would suppress the Assembly? and on this point opinions were pretty evenly divided. Meanwhile, those well versed in the signs of the times noticed that the police showed a contempt for individual freedom in forcible dissonance with the principles of liberty; that decorative symbols, nobiliary titles, coronets, and plumes were being revived in a manner not at all suggestive of equality; and that supplies of ammunition, extra pay, rations of wine, and new bayonets were being distributed to the troops on a scale that looked ominous for fraternity.

One Thursday evening towards the end of November, — I well remember the night, for it froze as on the Neva, and a fierce north wind was sweeping the dust through the deserted streets in clouds that choked and blinded one, — one evening, then, four out of the six members of the Hexameton were gathered together round the table in a parlor of the Café Rousseau, awaiting the arrival of the other two. It was nine o'clock, and the two missing members were Camille Lange and Louis Crème. It was not often either of them was late; but that evening they had not dined with us. Camille had left word that his editor wanted him for a sudden press of work; and Louis had written a short note to say that he had gone back to Saint Cyr to try and obtain three days' leave from his General, on the ground that his aunt was ill. We expected them both in the course of the evening, and were trying to console ourselves for their absence by taking deep pulls from the society's earthenware jug, and blowing dense clouds from our clay pipes. There was a blazing wood fire on the hearth. The red curtains were snugly drawn, the doors closely shut, and everything had been arranged by our careful host, M. Potiron, to make us as comfortable as possible whilst we plotted the overthrow of the State. But, from some unaccountable reason, we were not gay that night. The conversation flagged. Destouffes and Cascarot, the two students of law, were silent and meditative. Toupie, though it was not in his nature to be ever cast down, sipped his beer thoughtfully, as if perplexed by our low spirits. Myself, I felt depressed, although I scarcely knew why.

"Hark to the wind," said Horace Toupie, trying to shake off the oppressiveness of the long silence by rising and peering out of the window. "How piteously it howls! One would swear there were a whole kennelful of black dogs outside."

"Don't talk of black dogs, Toupie," murmured Maximilien Destouffes, who was a Breton, and, like all Bretons, superstitious. "They say in Brittany that the howling of a black dog bodes misfortune."

Horace Toupie, who could never be brought to look at anything seriously, set his tongue in his cheek.

"Do you know, Maximilien," he said, "after I have heard one of your Breton legends I fall to speculating as to what it would be like if the dead at the Morgue were to get up in the middle of the night, steal silently through the streets, and come and pull me out of bed by the legs. I dreamed that one night last week. When I got up in the morning I could n't brush my hair; it stood up on end all the rest of the day. Here, Cascarot, it's you who are monopolizing the beer-jug. Oblivioso levia Massico ciboria exple. Pass it round, and let us see if we can't manage all the four of us to look a little less as if we were going to be hanged. If Camille and Louis are not here soon, I shall vote for whist and minstrelsy." And without waiting any longer, Toupie struck up Béranger's Roger Bontemps, clapping his hands vigorously on his knees by way of accompaniment.

Toupie's voice so closely resembled a shrill cat-call that we joined in with him in the hope of drowning it. This made him redouble his efforts; and we were all four shouting at our loudest, when we heard hurried footsteps outside, and the next minute Camille and Louis rushed in together, both panting.

"What's up?" we all cried, stopping short; for the new-comers looked flushed and excited.

"We've had a run for it," said Camille, throwing himself down in a chair and laughing. "Something's in the wind, my friends! I'm watched by the police."

This communication had the effect of bringing us to our legs without delay: "Watched by the police?" we repeated.

"Yes," rejoined Louis Crème, who was fanning himself with his handkerchief. "I was coming over the Pont St. Michel on my way here, — for I've got my three days' leave, — when who should I see but Camille, running as if the cholera were after him; and behind him, at fifty paces, a couple of fellows with slouched hats, who were evidently in pursuit."

"Without more ado I darted across the road and barred the way to these latter. 'What are you following that man for?' I asked. They stopped astonished, for my kepi, my sword, and the cloak that concealed my tunic made them think I was an officer. 'Do you know him?' inquired one of them. 'No,' I answered, thinking it as well to be cautious. 'Then, Captain, I advise you not to meddle with what's no business of yours,' rejoined the other; and they tried to brush past me to go on with their running. But I wanted to give friend Camille time, so I caught hold of one of them by the scruff of the neck and said, 'Citizen, we are living under a republic; two men don't run after a third without reason; unless you tell me what you're about, I shall conclude you're up to no good, and exercise my undoubted prerogative of throwing you into the Seine.' I must mention that the bridge and quays were perfectly deserted, so that I could have drowned the pair of them without anybody being the wiser. This idea seemed to occur to them, for they glanced at each other uneasily, and then exclaimed almost together, 'But who told you we were following that man? We don't know anything about him. We're running home, that's all.' 'Yes, Captain,' went on the fellow I was holding, 'we're both servants in a boarding-house at the Barrière St. Jacques. It has been our day out; but we have got to be in by ten o'clock, so we are making the most of the half-hour left us.' By this time Camille was out of sight, having disappeared up a slum; I could therefore let go my birds without danger. 'I take you both for a couple of cut-purses,' I said, giving my man an amicable grip that made him gurgle; 'but I've no proof, so that I must deny myself the pleasure of sending you over the parapet. Only, I'll tell you what. You will both of you remain standing here and not move until I am off the bridge. When I have reached the quay you may go on with your walk; and in case you should really be servants, here are a couple of francs to pay you a cab home. But mind, if I catch you running again —' 'You'll give us in [charge?]' grinned one of them. 'No, not such a fool,' I rejoined, 'for I am convinced that you are cut-purses on excellent terms with the police; but I shall run into one of those public-houses yonder and denounce you as a pair of "mouchards." Republican workmen don't like that word, and it would only take me a few seconds to get together a dozen brave fellows who would look upon it as a real treat to have five minutes' fun with you.' This threat had its due effect upon them. They turned yellow and remained as motionless as mice on the bridge whilst I hastened off towards the quay. Once out of their sight, I set off running as hard as I could in the direction taken by Camille, and caught him up at last near the Panthéon. He swears the two fellows were mouchards, which is very likely; but I know nothing more about the matter than what I have just told you."

We had listened in profound silence whilst Louis was speaking. There was a mystery in the adventure which fascinated us. The fact that our president should be under the supervision of the police reflected an amount of credit upon the society of which we all felt disposed to take our share. When Louis had finished, we looked at each other triumphantly, as though to say that the day had come at last, and that something great and unusual was going to be required of us. Camille observed this exchange of glances; and notwithstanding his innate modesty, could not help seeming elated by it. His eyes sparkled as he proceeded with his narrative, still panting and excited.

"Yes; Louis did me a good service when he stopped those two fellows, for as I tell you there's something in the wind. When I went to the Pilori office this evening, I found Topignon, my editor, pale and nervous. He has been dogged about persistently during the last three days by a fellow who bears the stamp of the Rue de Jérusalem from the crown of his hat to the sole of his boots inclusively. It's the same with Tartine, our chroniqueur, who is growing melancholy and does n't like the look of it. The letters of our Belgian correspondent must have been opened at the post-office for the last three weeks, for we find some curious marais on the envelopes; and we learn from our correspondent by a telegram that he has sent two letters which have never reached us at all. But this is not the worst. Clampin and Riffard, the two Deputies of the Montagne, told Topignon to-day that they too are being watched; that the number of police at all the stations is being doubled; and that new battalions of soldiers are coming into Paris every day."

"They're right there," interrupted Louis. "Some old Saint-Cyrans came to the school yesterday; two of them are in the 29th Carbineers and three in the 115th foot. They told us they had been dosed with reviews during the last month until they were sick. Yet they swear by the President and talk already of a restoration of the Empire as if it were a thing accomplished."

"We must be ready now to act," broke in Maximilien Destouffes, in an exulting voice. "It is evident that the tussle between the Assembly and the Tyrant must soon end in a fight. The army is for the President, but the people are for the Republic."

"So are all the students," rejoined Hugues Cascarot, who was from Marseilles, and spoke in a quick Provençal accent. "Bagasse! we can make up a good fighting party. I've been sounding the École de Droit ever since the beginning of the term, and I've not found a man who was n't with us."

"And I will answer for the School of Medicine," exclaimed Toupie. "You should hear how we talk in the dissecting-room. I reckon if Maupas, the Prefect of Police, could listen to us he would feel his flesh creep a little, and take care not to come within hail of the Amphitheatre."

"I don't believe I can rely upon a single one of our fellows," murmured Louis, rather piteously. "We're all counts and viscounts in that shop. I don't think there are a dozen true republicans among us."

"Never mind. You alone are worth twelve dozen," answered Toupie; "though, if I'd been you, I should have pitched those two mouchards into the water, one on the top of the other. But it's always the way with you strong fellows," continued the student of medicine ruefully. "When Providence throws a mouchard across your path, you give him forty sous as a token of your esteem."

Louis shrugged his shoulders. "It remains to be proved that they were mouchards," he said, pouring all that remained of the beer into his glass, and tossing off the contents at a draught. "Perhaps, after all, they were only cut-throats, which is a presumption in their favor."

"If it had been so, you would n't have seen me run," answered Camille, quickly. "I know they were spies. When Topignon told me he had been watched, I remembered that one of the men Louis stopped had been playing shadow to me for the past week. On coming out of the office I saw him waiting for me on the pavement opposite, with another I had not seen before. If I ran, it was to give them the slip, so that they should not see where I went. I should n't have ventured to come here if they had followed me close."

"And now to business," said Maximilien, whose relish for grim talk was irrepressible.

"Yes," assented Camille, "to business. I have a six-chamber revolver, a double-barrelled gun, and a good supply of cartridges. Have all you fellows got arms?"

He replied affirmatively. Toupie, besides a revolver, possessed an old flintlock of his grandfather's.

"Very well," replied Camille. "Then to-morrow and the next day must be spent in telling everybody we can trust to be prepared. Louis, as you are on three days' leave, you can join in the work, — only you must n't go about in uniform. I have a list of 1,500 workmen who took part in all the risings of 1848, and who are known to be disaffected. Toupie, Destouffes, and Cascarot have each got a list, too, of workmen and students. Every one of them must be seen. Turn by turn, two of us must sit up during the night, and remain with our windows open, so as to be on the alert should anything be attempted in the dark. We must also have a password and a counterpass, to serve all the fighters as a rallying cry. What shall these words be?"

"HEXA and METRON, of course," exclaimed Destouffes, Cascarot, Louis, and I together.

"I venture to observe," said Toupie, "that, if we select these two words, we shall be obliged to give all the workmen a lesson in Greek, to teach them how to pronounce. For this reason I protest."

"Can't you be serious a single hour, Toupie?" retorted Camille, biting his lips. "Don't you know that at any moment we may be called upon to raise a barricade, and that before three days are over you and I and the lot of us may be sleeping side by side on the slabs of the Morgue?"

"That's what I should define as giving a man a pleasant foretaste," replied Toupie, demurely. "It's like Henri, whom I always find drawing pictures of men with their heads broken when I go into his studio."

Henri was myself.

"By the way, Henri," said Camille, reminded by Toupie's remark of a painting I had been working at for some weeks, "have you finished your picture of us six together yet?"

"I finished it this morning. You saw the sketch? We are all six on a barricade, you standing in the midst of us with a revolver in one hand and a red flag in the other."

"Thanks," answered Camille, reddening; and with this he drew from under his cloak a parcel made of silver paper, which he gravely opened. "Here is that flag," he said; and with a jerk unfolded a splendid blood-red banner in silk, with the words "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity," inscribed on one side; and the single word "HEXAMETRON" wrought in letters of gold on the other.

We all stood up together, glowing with emotion; even Toupie was moved. And as in France, among republicans of twenty, no emotion can exist without embraces, we threw ourselves sobbing into each other's arms, vowing by the bright ruby flag that, if we were not shortly installed at the Tuileries with a new Democratic Government pledged to liberty, equality, fraternity, and no taxes, it would be no fault of ours.

III.

The remaining arrangements were soon made. It was agreed that "Hexa" and "Metron" should be the pass and counterpass, that the next few days should be devoted altogether to propagandism, that the night-watching should begin that very evening in my studio, and that Camille and I should be the watchers. It was also decided that Camille should lodge with me for the present, so as to elude the vigilance of the mouchards, who were presumably following him, because of his connection with the Pilori; that interesting organ being unquestionably doomed to perish amongst the first in the event of a coup-d'état. It was past eleven by the time we had done planning. We were all flushed, but none of us tired, and we were about to ring for a bottle of Burgundy to toast success to our arms, when on a sudden there was a hurried, nervous knock at the door, and before we had had time to answer, or even to look round, M. Potiron, the host of the café tumbled into the room, looking as white as a sheet, and with his teeth chattering.

M. Potiron, it should be remarked, was essentially a man of peace, and a firm friend of existing institutions. The mission of a citizen, as he understood it, was to sail with the current, not to go against it. Therefore, when the breeze was Orleanist, M. Potiron hoisted the blue flag and manned his bark to the tune of "Vive le Roi!" When the wind shifted and blew freedomwards, he sent a red pennon up to his mizzen-mast, and cried louder than anybody, "Vive la République!" He was an honest publican, equitable in his measures, and was wedded to a pretty wife, whose winsome presence behind the counter did no harm to the trade of the "Café Rousseau." We had selected M. Potiron's establishment for our bi-weekly meetings, because it was comfortable and retired, because the beer was good, because the coffee was drinkable, and because we could have a private room, — four conditions not always to be found in other cafés.

We supposed that M. Potiron had an idea that we must be a club of some kind, but we had never honored him with our full confidence; for it is an unfortunate circumstance to be noted in connection with French publicans, that many of them — even such honest men as M. Potiron — are not always above the seductions held out by the Rue de Jérusalem; but will make an agreement with the authorities of that locality to report the sayings of their customers in consideration of a yearly wage. To do M. Potiron justice, we did not class him in this category; but we had made it a rule to be cautious, and we had not been sorry to notice that our private room was so large, and the door of it so thick, that anybody listening outside to try and catch what we said would have to spend his time unprofitably.

The sudden irruption of M. Potiron took us aback.

"O gentlemen! for mercy's sake, tell me the truth!" he began in a voice of consternation. "You're not conspiring to overthrow the Republic, are you?"

"It's not very likely," answered Camille, dryly. "Who put such an idea into your head?"

M. Potiron seemed so embarrassed for a reply, that there is no knowing what he would have said, had not his wife appeared opportunely to extricate him from his difficulty. She looked almost as much flurried as her husband; but quietly so, as be-seemed a pretty woman. The Hexameton en masse rose gallantly to receive her.

"O gentlemen," she said, — beginning in the same way as her lord, but more discreetly, and taking the precaution of closing the door behind her, — "O, gentlemen! is all this true?"

"What true, madame?" asked Louis Crème, who in women's presence felt as much at home as on his saddle. "Have they been telling you that we are a gang of brigands?"

"Not quite, monsieur," answered Madame Potiron, fixing her eyes on the handsome face of the young cadet and then blushing a little. "But —" Here she hesitated a moment, laid a finger mysteriously on her lips, and lowered her voice. "But the police have been here."

"Bless those police!" muttered Toupie; "I'm beginning to think we've had too much of them to-night."

"Yes, gentlemen, an inspector from the Prefecture, assented M. Potiron, plaintively. "He came in this evening as I've seen him do before, but this time he turned his two eyes upon me like the glasses of a dark lantern, and said in a tone that made me run cold; 'You don't harbor secret societies here, do you, M. Potiron?' 'Not I,' was my answer; 'but why?' 'O nothing,' he rejoined, in a tone as uncomfortable as the first time. 'Only they told me you did; so I thought I'd just step in, out of friendship, and show you a curious article in the Criminal Code, which I came across this morning. It says, that any person or persons harboring conspirators are liable to be treated as accomplices, and may be condemned to the full penalties incurred by the people they harbor, — transportation for instance, or penal servitude for life.' M. Potiron choked slightly as he pronounced this last sentence, and was going to proceed with further gloomy developments, when his wife cut him short by telling him to go and attend to his business in the café.

"Let me talk to these gentlemen," she said, evidently reassured by a closer look at us that we were not so black as we were painted; and as M. Potiron delayed somewhat to obey, she gave a small stamp of impatience.

[Concluded next week.]

FOREIGN NOTES.

MR. RUSKIN, the new Slade Professor of Art at Oxford, will begin, in February, a course of lectures on the materials of Art.

MR. D. G. ROSSETTI has a volume of Poems in the press which is to extend to 300 or 400 pp., and appear next spring. It will contain much early and much recent work. The sonnets recently printed in the Fortnightly Review indicate one of its sources of interest.

THE original autograph score of Mozart's Don Giovanni is preserved in the possession of Madame Viardot Garcia at her villa at Baden-Baden. It is handsomely bound in parts, kept in a carved oak case securely locked, and fastened to the wall of the building.

ONE of the London comic papers says, unkindly, that "His Insanity the King of Bavaria has given orders to the Meissen manufactory of (Dresden) china to prepare a group of 'Lohengrin and the Swan,' as a present to Richard Wagner. The swan will always remind the illustrious composer of the goose, his royal patron."

Mlle. NILSSON possesses a collection of rare and precious stones of considerable value. The fair cantatrice is also the owner of a rare manuscript of great antiquity, written in Gothic letters of silver by a Bishop of the Goths. This work was found during the sacking of Prague, and formerly belonged to Queen Christina of Sweden. It was given to Mlle. Nilsson by an admirer, the Count John George of Dubniki.

THERE is something wonderfully grotesque in the Japanese mind, with all its genuine force. It appears that whenever the Mikado goes abroad the upper windows of the streets through which he passes are closed and sealed up with paper bands, "so that no one may look down upon him," — not, that is, despise him, but stand on a greater elevation than he. At least, that is the theory in Siam, where courtiers are required to approach the sovereign hopping, like so many highly decorated toads, for fear their heads should be higher than his. The Japanese custom was, it appears, observed for the Duke of Edinburgh recently, as a final proof of the honor in which the Mikado held his English ally.

THE terrible famine which has been raging in Algeria for the last two years has obliged the French Government to look elsewhere than in that unfortunate colony for its supplies of horses for the light cavalry. The stock of small wiry "Arabs" which were bred in Algeria, and which did such excellent service in the Crimea, in Italy, and in Mexico, has been pretty nearly exterminated, so that for the next seven or eight years, at least, it will be impossible to obtain these valuable chargers in sufficient numbers for the French service.

"EVERYBODY now plays Bézique," says the Perrin. "May we, therefore, suggest to everybody that it would be much more rational to count by units instead of by tens, as it is at present the fashion to do? We would make the game 100 up, instead of 1,000, counting sequence 25 instead of 250; double Bézique 50 instead of 500, kings 8 instead of 80, each ten one, instead of 10. We are sorry to see that 'Cavendish' indorses the decimal method; but, surely, on reconsidering the question, he would admit that units are much more easy to count, and that our proposed method has the obvious advantage of simplicity. It would be just as rational to count points at whist by tens, and make 100 game, as to count Bézique by tens and hundreds."

A GERMAN paper tells an odd story of a trick played not long since on a landowner in an agricultural district of Silesia. This gentleman, a Herr Schrei, had a quarrel with a neighbor, which led to a long correspondence, and in one of his letters he greatly provoked his antagonist by speaking ironically of the "Attic salt" with which he flavored his epistolary style. A few days after there appeared in the local paper the following advertisement: "Attic salt and other salts for cattle may always be obtained at my farm.—Schrei." This advertisement immediately attracted the attention of a zealous official who was employed in the district to administer the salt monopoly of the Government, and he directed one of his subordinates to go at once to Herr Schrei's farm and search the premises for the salt in question. The subordinate, after going all over the farm and looking in every corner for the smuggled commodity, reported as follows: "Having learnt from the local paper that a foreign salt under the name of 'Attic salt' had been imported into this district, I searched the house and farm of the farmer Schrei, who had been suspected of the fraud; but no trace of Attic salt was to be found about him."

SPEAKING of Professor Max Müller's remarkable lecture on the Buddhist doctrine of annihilation (which we printed last week), the Pall Mall Gazette says: "In this lecture, remarkable alike for its profound investigation and the finished brevity and clearness of its style, the professor discussed and controverted the popular superficial notion that the religion of the vast majority of mankind, and which, according to the testimony of a Roman Catholic bishop, had anticipated the purest moral doctrines of the Christian faith, offers its believers no more consoling and satisfying solution of the great mysteries of evil and death than the repose of Buddha and the corruptions engrafted upon it, he shows that the Nirvāna, to which every true Buddhist should aspire, was, as the founder taught, nothing more nor less than perfect renunciation and supreme resignation. It cannot be indifferent to the Christian world to learn that a religion which is still held by the largest portion of the human race is not based upon Annihilation. Mr. Max Müller concluded his lecture with a touching apology from the Buddhist Scriptures, in which the true doctrine of Nirvāna renunciation and resignation is embalmed."

A NOTEWORTHY mural picture has just been completed in University Hall, Gordon Square, a college of which the late Crabb Robinson "was one of the most active founders and which he had in his lifetime largely endowed." The purport and nature of this memorial are clearly indicated in Mr. Sadler's "Reminiscences," as follows: "It is intended to decorate the ends and sides of the dining-room, which are well suited for the purpose, with a mural painting in monochrome by Edward Armitage, Esq., A. R. A., having for its subject Henry Crabb Robinson surrounded by many of his most distinguished literary and artistic friends. The aim will be to represent these distinguished persons rather as they have been graven on Mr. Robinson's memory, and have presented themselves to him in his happiest reveries, than with reference to any chronological or local arrangement." An English paper thus describes the painting: "The picture disposes itself into six groups. On the farther left Mrs. Barbauld is seen in earnest talk with Mr. Wakefield; Godwin, Hazlitt, Clarkson, and Walter Savage Landor stand by. Next is a company over which Wilhelm von Schlegel and Mme. de Staël preside. The Germans have a compartment to themselves, wherein the well-marked portraits of Goethe and Schiller at once arrest the eye; 'the Lake poets' also hold a conspicuous position. The next scene opens darkly with the grand, wild head of Edward Irving; beneath Samuel Rogers has taken his seat. On a sofa near at hand Lady Byron is listening to the Rev. F. W. Robertson, — neither portrait being flattered. Talfourd, Arnold, Bunsen, and others are near. The selection has been made by 'the committee'; the pictorial treatment we owe to Mr. Armitage. The picture is fifty-six feet long, and the figures, thirty-four in number, are somewhat over life-size."

THE London Times sounds a fearful note of alarm. It is much to be feared, it says, that England, or at least London, is at this moment threatened with the invasion of a formidable disease. "We have from time to time mentioned the unusual activity of certain kinds of Fever in the metropolis and other great towns, but there is more to be told than meets the eye in the REGISTRAR-GENERAL'S Returns, and it will need all our vigilance to protect us from the serious risks of the coming winter. How busily Scarlet Fever is at work the weekly bills of mortality teach us only too plainly; but for the last three months a new and more insidious enemy has been in the field. To many persons — perhaps, indeed, to many medical practitioners — 'Relapsing Fever' may be a disease known only by tradition or description, for it is a fact, we believe, that for a period of thirteen years hardly a case of the disorder was seen in the United Kingdom. The 30,000 cases, for instance, treated dured not a single specimen of this particular Fever, although at a former period it had been alarmingly prevalent. When we say that it is known also by the name of 'Famine Fever,' we shall have given some idea of its origin and character, and yet it must not be confused with the more terrible plague which proverbially follows dearth. The 'Famine' Fever of which we have now to speak is not in itself or immediately a destructive disease. It is very rarely fatal, and corresponds in its principal characteristics rather with the 'Low Fever' of our medical nomenclature than with any of the more violent forms of the malady. It is dangerous from its extreme communicability and its distressing consequences. It is easily caught; it is easily carried from place to place; it is very difficult to deal with; and it leaves the unhappy victim predisposed by weakness and exhaustion to the attacks of more acute complaints. 'Relapsing Fever,' in fact, is the ally and provider of Typhus."

SPIRITUALISM, if we may credit its French organ, which appears twice a month at Lyons, is making progress in France, especially among the inhabitants of the provincial towns. Readers of this periodical are assured in an editor's standing note that "communications between the spirit world and the corporal world are in the nature of things, and constitute no supernatural fact; and hence traces of them are to be found among every people at every epoch; in the present day they are general and patent to all the world." A medium (anonymous) discourses to his son on the advantages of "la médiumnité," a word which has not as yet received the sanction of that sceptical body the French Academy. This spirit assures us that the faculty of "médiumnité est innée chez tous les hommes, quoiqu'elle ne se développe chez tous également, et la preuve que cette faveur doit être méritée, c'est que dans certains cas elle est retirée à ceux qui n'en sont plus dignes." In another number the spirit of Lacordaire, who delivers a discourse very different in matter and manner from any that he preached at Notre Dame during his lifetime, comes forward to declare that the Church is one and indivisible, and that le père Hyacinthe has suffered persecution for maintaining this doctrine. But by far the most garrulous of all the spirits is that of M^{me}. Fouquet, who, under the heading "Freely ye have received, freely give," communicates each fortnight certain new and sure remedies against all kinds of human disorders. In the most recent number is a communication from the poet Ponsard, who, perhaps from want of faith in French sculptors, returns to express a hope that the project of erecting a statue to his memory will not be carried out. In its place he would prefer a school for the children of working men; and should his wish be adopted by his fellow-townsmen, he promises that at each distribution of school prizes "son esprit satisfait, planant dans l'espace au-dessus de ces petites têtes blondes et brunes, allant des élèves aux professeurs, leur inspirera de chaleureux discours, de douces paroles de paix d'amour et de fraternité."

THE Academy publishes the following interesting note from Mr. A. H. Layard, touching the recent discoveries at Pompeii:—

"Naples, October 14, 1869.—Amongst the most recent discoveries at Pompeii there is one of considerable interest and altogether of a novel character. On the walls of a house of no great size and evidently belonging to persons of the poorer class, was found a view of the Amphitheatre of Pompeii, of the city walls and towers adjoining it, and of a building of considerable size, apparently depending upon the amphitheatre, the remains of which must still be under ground, and for which Fiorelli is now going to search. Although this landscape is rudely executed, and is evidently the work of a mere dauber, it represents very accurately the general features of the remains of the amphitheatre now existing: the exterior staircases, built upon arches, leading to the upper vomitoria, the arena (the walls of which are represented as painted to imitate marble, and so they were found when first dug out), the city walls, and the towers, &c. The artist has recorded in his picture the fight between the people of Pompeii and Nocera, which commenced in the amphitheatre, and led to its being closed for ten years by Nero. Various groups of combatants are seen on the gradines of the amphitheatre, in the arena, on the walls of the city, and in the open space surrounding the building. Men are falling, wounded, and others lie dead on the ground.

"In the space surrounding the amphitheatre are seen trees, and stalls protected from the sun by awnings, such as are now everywhere erected in the streets of Naples; fruit and lemonade were probably sold in them: in one is a bench exactly like those in common use with us. Men and women are seen flying from the fight which is raging, some apparently carrying away their goods.

"The velarium is represented as drawn over a part of the theatre to protect the spectators from the sun. This is, I believe, the first time that representation of this important addition to a Roman theatre has been found; but, unfortunately, owing to the ignorance of the artist of the rules of perspective, it is difficult to make out precisely how the velarium is extended. He has drawn it as attached to the city wall, which could scarcely have been the case; and it appears to have hung in large folds, horizontally over the part of the theatre which it was intended to protect.

"Unluckily the artist has taken his sketch from the side facing the entrance. Had he taken it from the opposite side, we might have had a view of Vesuvius, which would have been highly interesting as giving the form of the mountain previous to the first historical eruption.

"This very curious painting is especially interesting as being, I believe, the only existing ancient view of a building, the details of which can be identified. If similar views of Rome, Pompeii, and other cities, executed by competent artists, had been preserved, they would have been invaluable. Unfortunately, sketches of this kind were made by very inferior painters, who appear to have amused themselves by daubing on the walls, whilst artists of a superior class appear to have confined themselves either to the reproduction of well-known pictures, or to the representation of the usual myths, fables, and legends.

"I may mention that on the outer walls of the building adjoining the amphitheatre, and which Signr. Fiorelli believes to be a kind of dressing and bathing place for the gladiators, are represented inscriptions, such as are usually found on the houses of Pompeii, and relating to the election of municipal officers. Signr. Fiorelli expects to find the original inscriptions when he discovers the remains of the edifice."

THE DEATH PENALTY.

A NARRATIVE.

By JULES SIMON.

[Translated from the French by MR. W. H. HUNTINGTON for EVERY SATURDAY.]

PART IV.

VIII.

It was long after nightfall; the rear of the hall was but dimly lighted, and the crowd flowed out slowly. The ushers offered with humane readiness to take us out by a private passage; but Marion wanted to embrace her husband, and drew me with such force, that I was obliged to follow her. When we reached the courtyard, the condemned were just entering it by another door, surrounded by gendarmes. Marion burst through the throng and threw herself on her husband's neck. As he was handcuffed, and was near sinking under the tumult of his emotion, an old brigadier of gendarmery held him up, on whose mustache there fell great tears.

The mother likewise came tottering up to embrace her children; but M. Jourdan stopped her, calling out to me to bring away Marion. He had trouble enough to persuade them that it was better to go to the prison and avoid the crowd. At this juncture came an usher bringing similar counsels from the judge-president. He was ordered to inform the family that every access to the prisoners would be allowed them, and that, if they decided to sign a petition for mercy, it would be countersigned by every member of the tribunal.

We returned by side streets, so as to avoid the multitude. Being come into the chamber, the father sank on his knees, the two women also kneeling behind him, and recited aloud the De Profundis, the women responding at each verse. When the prayer was ended, Marion rose and told me she was going to help her mother-in-law to bed; for her father and herself, they should pass the night in prayer; then, grasping my hand, she added, "Perhaps they will let you in this evening."

I understood her, and left immediately. I could not speak for the choking in my throat. And besides, what was there for me to say to them? I walked on to the jail, in the snow and bareheaded. The icy coldness of the night somewhat helped to calm the fever of my blood. The concierge let me in immediately, telling me that M. Jourdan was with them.

Under the control of one fixed idea, I cried out as I entered, "Well, have you signed your appeal?" They sat motionless, with flushed faces, their eyes staring on vacancy, and made no response.

"Talk to them," said M. Jourdan, in a tone that startled me.

Turning my eyes to him, I saw that he was weeping.

"For more than an hour here I have been begging them to appeal," he said. "This appeal will give us several months; much can be done with time. If some one of the band should be caught, it would be enough to make their innocence evident. For that I believe in," he broke out excitedly, rising at the same time; "my faith in it is now invincible; and if they die they take with them my peace of mind forever. But you see them just as they have been since the sentence, immovable as statues. I have begged, supplicated, been on my knees before them. I have talked to them of their father and of their mother, of the wife of Jean Louis, and of myself; I have plied every argument imaginable;—nothing moves them." Then, turning towards them and giving the younger of the brothers a vigorous shake, "Why, you unhappy wretch, this is a crime you are committing here!" and next, with an instant change of sentiment, he said, "In the name of Jesus Christ, for your father's and your mother's sake! pity for my sake—" And he kissed his head and hands, which he wet with tears. And so that indescribable scene of passionate dismay and pity went on. At last Yvonic rose from his seat.

"There is no justice," he said in a hoarse voice. "It is better to die soon."

We obtained no other words. They came to tell us we must leave for the night. Then Jean Louis spoke in a whisper, asking me, "What is she doing?"

"She is counting on your making an appeal," I answered. "It will be the death-blow of all there if you keep to your obstinacy."

"God's will be done!" he said; "my mind is made up."

When I found myself in the street with M.

Jourdan, it seemed as though my brain were reeling. He gave me an appointment for eight o'clock the next morning.

We had resolved to return to the prison at an early hour, and bring there with us all the family, in hopes to obtain our permission of free action. We found the father and daughter seated on stools before the dead ashes of a fire they gave no heed to relighting. They had spent the night there, motionless and silent. The father rose and came to grasp the hand of M. Jourdan. "Do not thank me yet, Nayl," he said; "I have not done with the case. I hope that I shall save them; but they must help me." There was no break in the settled gloom of the old man's countenance, and I saw that he had no hope. "The old wife is going mad," he said to us with an air of helpless distress. And I presently learned from Marion that her mother-in-law really appeared to have become unconscious of what was passing around her. For her part, Marion was active and resolute; and one could see that hope survived in her, and with it a firm purpose to will and do.

When she was sufficiently possessed of the occurrences of the preceding night by our report, and we spoke to her of trying to move the brothers, "It is of no use," she said, "since their minds are made up. But if the judge himself told them they ought to appeal, that might make a difference." Here was a flash of light for us. These few words let us into the secret of the persistence of the three men, who no longer believed in human justice and no longer desired to dispute their life, partly from despair, partly from disgust.

We repaired with all speed to the Royal Attorney. "What do you wish?" he asked of M. Jourdan. "I will do everything in my power to aid your efforts. Although the sentence is just, the thought of seeing these three, whose lives were hitherto pure, dying thus in the prime of their young manhood most painfully shocks me. I cannot sign the petition for mercy; but, when my report is called for, I can tell you in advance that it will be favorable to a commutation."

"A petition for mercy!" exclaimed Jourdan, "why, sir, they will not even appeal! They want to die, all three; they don't listen to us, they don't listen to their parents. But, M. Hervo," he went on to say, "we are no longer in the court-room; I am not making a pleading here. You see before you an old friend. You know that he is honest; you admit that he has common sense. Mark now what I am going to tell you: they are guiltless, all three!"

He uttered the last words with the emphasis of deep conviction, and the tears came to his eyes as he spoke. It was in vain that M. Hervo attempted to resume the argument he had addressed to the court; Jourdan interrupted, and with an extraordinary animation and an eloquence that I have never heard since from any mouth, he began a pleading, of which the effect was irresistible. He spoke of the confidential communications he had received and his visits to the prison, entering into the fullest detail and showing the integrity and heroism of those three noble souls. It was not a train of reasoning that would have succeeded with a bench of judges; but there, at that solemn hour, it was impossible not to yield to the empire of this ardent eloquence and absolute conviction.

M. Hervo was moved at first, then shaken. His scruples were awakened; and as soon as there was a doubt in his mind, he became more eager than

M. Jourdan himself to obtain a declaration of appeal. Hardly had his friend done speaking, than we saw him prepared to go out; we followed rather than accompanied him. From time to time on the way, he stopped to ask us a rapid question. We had an answer always ready. He was not persuaded, however, but he doubted; and for his tender conscience doubt in such a matter was the beginning of remorse.

We found the prisoners still together, for M. Hervo had requested this consolation to be allowed them. His first words on entering were, "I am come to tell you that M. Jourdan alarms me. I conducted your prosecution with a quiet conscience; but this morning I am startled. If you are guiltless, you must not go to the scaffold; it would be making me answerable to God for your death. During twenty years of official life I have been ruled by the sole desire of firmly and strictly fulfilling my duty. Hitherto I have been at peace with myself. The thought of a judiciary error makes me tremble. — Jourdan, draw up the form. Ah, you have it with you? Give me a pen. Sign," he said to Yvonic, with an air full of dignity and authority. Yvonic did not hesitate an instant. The language and bearing of this upright man had reconciled him with society. He had come to understand that justice might make mistakes, but that there was a justice. He was the one who was to be a priest, and although he was not the oldest he had a certain authority over the whole family. His two brothers signed after him. Hardly was the act completed than they became different men. Their stubborn mood of suppressed defiance gave way to anxiety and discouragement. M. Hervo had left immediately after the signing. We did all we could to revive their courage.

"But everything is against us," they complained. "We shall be condemned over again; all we have gained is a lengthening out of our death agony."

In those first moments we could not share their despondency. Happy at having overcome the obstacle that arrested us, we indulged in that feeling of release that always follows a success of this kind; but the following days hope left us also.

The judgment was set aside for some defect of form which I have forgotten. We rejoiced at it as a respite, without any of us daring to think of the future. Marion was admirable, dividing her life between the poor crazed mother, the old father, and her husband; always busy, as diligent in her attentions to everybody as in the better days, concealing her secret troubles, and never giving up to despair.

I had been with her to Saint Allouestre, Kerdrouen, and Bignan. We interrogated everybody. Everywhere we met with the most lively sympathies, but no testimony, no word, no fact that could change the character of the prosecution and authorize us to hope. We went a second time to Bignan after the appeal was granted; but on this second journey we felt that the opinion of the people was changed, a fortnight before they saw only our misfortune and unanimously judged it to be irremediable. Now that a new trial must take place, they were no longer occupied with the condemned alone; they felt the necessity of saving the others. Had not Marion herself obeyed a similar sentiment, when she told her husband in open court, "Rather die than turn informer"? They reminded her of these noble words while loading her with praises that were now so many deadly blows. The great politicians (they are not rare even among the ignorant and simple) blamed our friends for having rejected the responsibility of the assassination. They firmly believed in their culpability and made of it their title of honor; but as has happened before with zealous adherents of a cause who know themselves safe from pursuit, they declared, with a vehemence which was not without a sort of wild eloquence, that it was cowardly to disown one's conduct and friends and principles for the sake of escaping the scaffold. Marion did not get angry when they thus insulted the condemned. She did not enter into discussions. She contented herself with saying that they had not done the deed and that therefore they ought not to be allowed to die. If I suffered my indignation to appear, she looked at me with surprise and begged me to calm myself.

We sometimes walked through the country as many as eight leagues in one day, for we visited from preference the isolated farm-houses, where we had most chances of meeting with refractories. Marion walked always in advance and silent, holding her shoes in her hand, which she only put on when we visited a curé. The refusals of aid became more and more stern as time went on, for the word had been given to that effect. The rector of Saint Allouestre, who had been one of the witnesses for the defence, bitterly complained that Marion was more formidable to the refractories than a company of movable gendarmes. She burst into tears, without other reply. We were constantly received with, "How! you here again?" sometimes even with menaces. I advised her to return to Vannes. "You will go back, M. Jules, if you wish," said she in her soft voice, "but I must keep on to the end."

In general, the women displayed less ill-will. One of them, who kept the haberdasher's shop at Saint Jean Brévelay, tremblingly disclosed to us the existence of three hiding-places, dug in the moor of the Ménéhom in the days of the old chouannery, and the secret of which was revealed only to the initiated. She told us we should run great risks in going there. We visited them one after the other, crouching in the third for hours together: no one came. Another woman informed us, after having us swear to keep the secret, that Jean Brien, with a number of refractories, was hiding in the ruins of Locmaria. This was our last hope, for there remained hardly a house in the country that we had not visited. The distance was long, yet Marion, although evidently worn out, almost ran as she went. We arrived about midday. Locmaria is neither a burg nor a village, but a ruined abbey, near which is annually held a celebrated fair. I was familiar with all the windings of these ruins, with the stone staircases, that led up to the height of five stories and suddenly ended in the open air, with the cellars and long subterranean passages, that were in some places fallen in and obstructed. We spent several hours in wandering through them. It was one of those great abbeys where formerly the daughters of noble families came to bury themselves from the world, which resembled palaces rather than monasteries. In a kind of underground cloister we found beds of fern still fresh, and traces of fire recently extinguished. There was no longer any doubt that the persons we were in search of were in the habit of repairing thither; it was one of their retreats. But there, as in the moors of the Ménéhom, would not our presence suffice to keep them away?

Marion left the ruins, came as far as Plumelec

(only a half-league distant), and there told me that she should return to Locmaria alone in the night, passing through the fields to avoid being met. I told her that I should not let her expose herself alone to the risks of such an expedition. There would only be danger, she replied, in case she were defended; and I could but recognize the soundness of the observation. She went as she proposed as night was falling. Being so well aware of how we were regarded through the country, I dreaded that I might never see her again and followed her at a distance, taking all possible precautions against being seen or heard. The entrance of the staircase was in the chapel behind the high altar. On the first step of the altar she remained seated, from nine o'clock till midnight, in the thick darkness. Towards midnight she heard sounds as of persons cautiously picking their way through the ruins; to reach the subterranean story they must pass near enough to touch her. Suddenly there was a whispering audible at a few paces distant, and presently the rapidly retreating steps of a number of persons, apparently careless enough now of the noise they made. She instantly rose up, saying who she was, and calling Jean Brien, Le Pridoux, and all those she knew, by their names. They shouted back from the distance that they had nothing to say to her, that her searches were imperilling everybody, and that if they fell in with us, — her and myself, — they would fire on us as they would on Blues. She ran in pursuit of the fugitives, following them as long as she could hear them. They fired once at her, probably to frighten her, and then broke into a fast run in fear that the discharge of the gun would bring the gendarmes on them. I was now only a few paces from her, and called out, "It is I, Marion." She admitted this time that all was lost.

I drew from her the recital of the above incidents by piecemeal next day as we were on our road back to Vannes. She bewailed the utter fruitlessness of her labors, constantly repeating, "I have done my best and done no good!"

I, who was not so absorbed as she in a single idea, felt at this juncture less inclined to despondency than to anger. These three innocents, then, were to die so! These men whom we had sought for so long, who had fled from us, who perhaps had meant to kill us, knew that they were innocent, and, for fear, left them under the guillotine! All this population, women, priests, and old men, took the part of the guilty against the guiltless! I was wellnigh ready to say with my poor Yvonic, "There is no justice."

We returned to Vannes on foot, for we were not afraid of fatigue, and we were too poor to hire horses. The first thing we learned on reaching the town was the arrest of Le Pridoux and Jean Brien.

LOST IN THE POST-OFFICE.

BY HESBA STRETTON.

THE will lay upon the counter before me, and my eyes were riveted upon the large cover which contained it, and which bore the inscription, "R. Grey, Esq., Mitre Buildings, The Temple, London." Within it lay Kate's destiny and mine. Whether we were to be married or no before our hair was gray was the secret wrapped up in its folds.

To go back to the beginning. My father had been the junior partner in the old bank of Fletcher and Slaney, of Thornbury, which had come to grief, after an honorable old-fashioned manner, paying off all its debts, according to the custom of forty years ago, at the expense of the firm, who thereupon became poor men. My father had many friends, and in those times, when political influence had its finger in the bestowal of all public offices worth having, the members for our Tory borough had little difficulty in procuring for the ex-banker the office of postmaster, then vacant. The bank-offices, occupying the ground-floor of our residence, were altered somewhat to suit the new purposes to which they were put. The public business room became a sort of outer office, and my father's private apartment the stamping and sorting place for the letters. The upper portion of the partition wall was thrown down, but left at a sufficient height to screen the inner room from the observation of any person in the outer one; yet it was open enough to make every word audible in either part, unless intentionally spoken in a whisper. In the course of a few years my father appointed me his head clerk, upon the promotion of the previous clerk to an office of his own; and our united salaries then amounted to £400 a year, besides the numerous perquisites which at that time of day fell to the share of the postmaster, such as private letter-bags, and the postage upon local letters. We had two under-clerks, and the duties were light; very different from what they have since become, as I am told. The penny postage had only just come in; postage-stamps were still an institution of the future, and money-orders had been a recognized branch of the establishment no more than two years. Only four years before, the stamp duty on newspapers had been 3*d.* apiece, and the wildest Whig had not yet dreamed of a penny paper. There were hours in our post-office when our two subordinates were more than sufficient for all the work of the place, and my father's post was little else than a sinecure.

One of the borough-men, who had been most active in procuring this comfortable berth for us, was an old crony of my father's,—both of them were Masons, and both dabblers in chemistry,—and also the wealthiest man in the whole neighborhood. He was a bachelor, and continued to live very much in the simple and inexpensive style he had been used to in poorer days. His money had grown by lucky speculations and careful economy. A good number of his kindred lived about the town, all moderately well off, and more or less successful in life, except the brother next eldest to himself, who, having entered the Church, had gained no higher promotion in it than a poor curacy in his native town, with an income of £100 a year. Old Lawrence treated him with a kind of fretful, irritable brotherliness, which was but poorly plastered over by a yearly gift, grudgingly given, of another hundred. I need scarcely say that all the kindred were specially affectionate to old Lawrence.

His niece, Kate Lawrence, the curate's daughter, was,—well! I shall not try to describe what she was, except by saying that I was in love with her, and had been ever since I had first seen her in church, listening, with a beaming and loving face, to her father preaching one of his prosiest sermons. Everybody knew I was in love with Katie, for I made no secret of it; and Katie was just as simply and frankly in love with me, and made no secret of it either. Yet I am quite sure I had never asked her, in so many words, if she would be my wife; but we were tacitly, without pledge or promise given, engaged to marry one another as soon as fickle fortune would permit it. When that would be, the most prophetic soul could not foretell; for our lavish household expenditure at home, which had not been materially reduced upon the failure of the bank, swallowed up the united income of my father and myself; while my three sisters, now portionless, did not seem in a fair way to make eligible settlements. There was only one chance, a distant one,—when old Lawrence died, would he leave Katie or her father any portion of his accumulated wealth?

Six or seven years had passed without any brightening of our prospects, when, quite unexpectedly, one morning old Lawrence's housekeeper rushed in with the news that she had found her master dead in his bed. Only the night before, he and my father had been trying some chemical experiments, and the shock to the latter was so violent that he was insensible for some time, and continued speechless after his consciousness had apparently returned. Of course, my mother and sisters were in great agitation, and it was an hour or two before I could leave them, after assisting to get my father to bed, and sending for his doctor. As soon as I could, however, I hastened to the poor solitary old man's house. The streets were all in commotion, and the whole town seemed in a fever of curiosity concerning the sudden event, and what might result from it. In the house itself I found every one of the relatives who lived in the town, including two younger brothers and a married sister of the deceased; and by the side of the dead man sat Katie's father, genuine tears of sorrow blinding his eyes.

The excitement, once awakened, did not seem likely to slumber again till curiosity was satisfied. It was plain that the old man had died from natural causes; but as soon as the town was assured of that, the question upon every tongue was, "Has he made a will?" or, "How has he left his money?" I was myself devoured by anxiety, of which I was half ashamed. If he had died intestate, Katie's father, as heir-at-law, would come into possession of his landed property, and into a fourth part of his personality, which would be no insignificant windfall in itself. It was a subject which might well thrust itself upon me, in spite of my father's serious attack, which seemed not unlike a stroke of paralysis.

During the course of the afternoon, old Lawrence's solicitor, Mr. Snape, was announced, and I went to speak to him. He requested to see my father, with a very important tone and expression of countenance.

"It is impossible," I answered, "quite impossible; he cannot see any one. He has not spoken since this morning, when he heard of the sudden death of his old friend. Arnold is apprehensive of paralysis. Is it anything that I can do?"

"No, no," replied Mr. Snape; "your father is one of the executors to Mr. Lawrence's will, and I have brought it here with me, to consult him about it. The other is Grey, of the Temple. Under these circumstances, I suppose I must forward it to him; and perhaps it is best. It must be proved at Canterbury, and he can see to it at once."

"Why at Canterbury?" I asked eagerly.

"Because there is landed property in three different dioceses," he answered. "I'll send it to Grey by to-night's mail."

"Well, my father can do nothing," I said, wondering all the time whether Mr. Snape knew what were the provisions of the will, so momentous to Katie and me.

There was a will, however; that far was certain. A kind of wild hope, which had been kindled in my breast, was quite quenched by the visit from Mr. Snape. I felt myself sinking into a gloomy depression, which appeared exceedingly ominous to me. For three or four hours I brooded despondently over the fact that there was a will, scarcely allowing myself to cherish a spark of hope that Katie was provided for in it; for how often does a rich man leave his money to the poorest of his kindred? I had nothing else to occupy my mind. My mother and sisters sat weeping in my father's darkened and silent room. All the windows in our house had the curtains drawn. At last it occurred to me that this was the last day of September, and that the money-order account, which was made up quarterly, ought to be balanced, and sent up to London by that night's mail. Glad of anything to work at, I went down stairs to the inner office, found the necessary forms, and set myself steadily to the task.

I had just completed it, and folded up my balance-sheet, when I heard a footstep and voice in the outer office, both loud, and of a kind to arrest attention. They belonged to one of Snape's clerks, who had come in to post his master's letter.

"Look here," he said; "I was to see you take this one straight in to Mr. Slaney; it's on no account to be left here with ordinary letters. It's old Lawrence's will, I guess. By George! I only wish that my name was inside of it."

It was brought in to me immediately, and placed before me on the counter. I did not touch it, but there it lay, a long narrow packet, not over-large or bulky, yet containing the whole of Kate's future and mine.

I cannot say how long I sat before it, fascinated, perfectly spellbound; my eyes riveted upon it, as if they could see through the thick cover, and read the momentous lines within. I never touched it with my finger even. I felt as if I no more dare do that than I would have dared to tease and arouse some deadly serpent. I am conscious, however, that not the shadow of an idea of opening it ever crossed my mind. At last I felt a warm smooth little hand laid upon mine, and Katie's voice whispered close to my ear. "What is it you're staring at, Harry?"

There was, of course, an entrance into this inner office from the house, and Katie had stolen in several times before, when I was alone, and had always spoken in the lowest of whispers, lest the clerks in the office beyond should overhear her; yet I started nervously at the sound of her voice and the touch of her hand, and she was obliged to repeat her question before I seemed to comprehend it.

"That is your uncle's will," I answered.

Her eyes met mine, and there was a strange look in them, such as I had never seen before, — an uneasy, troubled, almost sly expression. She had been crying until they were red, and appeared smaller than usual under their swollen lids. She dropped her eyelids hurriedly, and then she whispered again, —

"If there had been no will?"

I answered her as if that were a question, but afterwards it occurred to me that it was but an involuntary utterance of her wish.

"Your father would have been heir-at-law, Katie," I replied, "and you a great heiress."

As I was speaking, an alarmed and hurried voice called loudly for me from the interior of the house, — a voice so urgent, and strung to such a pitch of terror, that it drove every thought of anything else out of my mind. At two or three bounds I sprang up the staircase, and into my father's bedroom, where every one was in confusion and dismay. Some crisis of his sudden attack had come on, and he was to all appearance in the agonies of death. A friendship, too rare between father and son, existed between him and me, — a very close friendship, which had grown with my growth from boyhood. To lose him would be to lose half my life. I did not give a thought to my official duties; the Queen's mail was nothing to me; and during the whole of that long night I never left my father's side.

The next morning he was pronounced to be out of immediate danger, though he continued speechless, and seemed scarcely conscious of our presence. By dint of persevering entreaty, my mother persuaded me to go and lie down, when I fell into one of those utter and awful lethargies, deeper and more deathlike than sleep, which now and then seem to come to obliterate any impression stamped too deeply upon the brain. When I awoke I felt calm and strong again. Katie was in the house, and she and my sister lavished upon me those trivial feminine attentions so inexpressibly soothing after any great emotion, when one is suffering from the languor which usually follows it.

When the hour for making up the mail arrived, I went down into the office, and made some slight inquiries as to how the clerks had managed the work the evening before. They had been late, of course; but the mail-coach — there was no railway near Thornbury then — had waited for them to complete their evening's despatch, and they believed everything had gone off as well as usual.

But the return mail proved that everything had not gone off as well as usual. Our mail, leaving Thornbury at 8 P.M., reached the London office about noon the next day; and the return mail, not quitting London until eight o'clock of the following morning, threw the arrival of the answers to correspondence to the fourth morning. On the fourth day after old Lawrence's death, to the serious inconvenience of all parties, there appeared no reply to Mr. Snape's communication to Mr. Grey, which had been enclosed with the will, and in which he desired to be immediately acquainted with any instructions left by the deceased in regard to his funeral. The next London mail was waited for, but there was still no letter; and then the interment necessarily took place, while the solicitor addressed a second communication to the executor.

I awaited, with the keenest anxiety, the arrival of Mr. Grey or his reply, and all the town was on the tip-toe of expectation. The relatives did nothing but meet one another, and discuss the will in all its possibilities. There was a wistful look about Katie's face. It was nine days now since old Lawrence's death, but the wonder, instead of dying out, was growing greater every day. Why did not the executor come to satisfy the general curiosity, and set the general mind at ease? The mail-bags reached Thornbury about midnight, and were ordinarily deposited in the office to await the appointed hour for opening them at seven in the morning, which was considered quite early enough for the accommodation of the public. But upon this occasion Mr. Snape spent the evening with me, and when the mail arrived, he and I went down alone into the quiet office, where I picked out the London bag, opened it, took out the bundles of letters, ran my eager fingers and eyes over them, until I came to the one I was in search of, and handed it over to the lawyer.

There was a dead silence in the hour and place, only the clock ticking off the seconds as evenly as if nothing was happening. I watched Mr. Snape's face hungrily, as if it would reflect and disclose what he was reading. The letter was brief, but he read it over twice. It seemed a very long pause of suspense to me, yet I suppose three minutes had scarcely passed.

"He says he has never heard of old Lawrence's death!" exclaimed Mr. Snape at length; "he knows nothing about his will—has never received it!"

"Never received it!" I repeated, "not received it! But I could take my oath it went from this office."

"Did you see it go into the bag yourself?" asked Mr. Snape.

I hesitated a minute or two, for that deep, lethargic sleep I spoke of had dimmed my recollections of that night. I remembered it was the night I had left the two under-clerks to do all the work alone, while I was watching beside my father; but I recalled also the exact spot where I had left the will on the counter, reared up against the folded money-order account, which had been duly acknowledged as received. If one had gone safely, why not the other?

"No," I answered, after that long pause; "I took it in, and left it here on the counter; but the clerks did the work that evening. It would be impossible for them to overlook it. Besides, we should have found it the next day if it had been left behind; and I should certainly have informed you of the irregularity. No. It must have gone from here."

So said the elder clerk, when we questioned him in the morning. He could not positively swear to it, because they had been hurried and flurried over their work; but he was quite sure it must have gone, if it had been on the counter as I described. The other clerk, who had taken it in, and knew it to be old Lawrence's will, had not made up the London bag, or he would have taken special notice of it, and would have been able to swear to it. Still, both of them were very positive that it had not been left behind; though it might have got into the wrong bag, and been missent.

"I'll go up to London by to-night's mail," said Mr. Snape.

Nothing could be more significant of the importance of the document; for a journey to London by coach, occupying sixteen hours at the swiftest, was not undertaken for a trifle. The anxiety which had been devouring me was now sharpened to a keener point; but both Mr. Snape and I wished to keep the affair quiet as long as possible, and I said nothing about it to any one, my father being still too ill to have it confided to him. As for the clerks, both being unmarried men, there was little danger of their telling tales out of school, after being once warned to keep it to themselves for the present.

But the anxiety I had suffered before was security itself compared with my consternation and disquietude when Mr. Snape returned, accompanied by Mr. Grey, who asserted that he had seen nothing whatever of the packet which had been posted in our office. There was not the shadow of a doubt of that last circumstance. The clerk who received it and I myself were compelled to admit that it had been safely deposited with us; but no trace of it could be found beyond that. Both Snape and Grey had been to the General Post-Office to make inquiries there, but nothing was known of it. The whole onus of the disappearance rested upon our office, and the three persons within it.

It was simply impossible to keep the mysterious loss of old Lawrence's will any longer a secret. The relatives were ready to pull Mr. Grey to pieces as soon as he showed his face in the town. Was it not shameful, scandalous, that a fortnight had already dragged by, and no one knew how a quarter of a million of money—for rumors said the old man's wealth was no less—had been bequeathed? With real reluctance Grey made known the facts. There had been a will; he and the postmaster were executors; it had been posted for him on the night after old Lawrence's death, and nothing more was known about it.

The excitement in the town was tenfold, a hundred-fold greater now than on the occasion of the testator's sudden death. Our post-office was besieged, and the clerks plied with questions, while I kept myself safely out of sight in the inner office, brooding in perplexity over the singular occurrence. I could arrive at no other conclusion than that the packet must have slipped into a wrong bag, and so been missent. Of course there were worrying inquiries made by the London authorities, to which I could give no other reply than this supposition. The affair was of such importance that official circulars were despatched to most of the offices in the kingdom, requiring any information concerning any missent letters; and in the course of a few weeks a handsome reward was offered for the discovery of the missing document.

About five weeks after old Lawrence's death I received a summons to present myself before the surveyor of the district, a Mr. Talbot, who lived sixteen miles or so from Thornbury. He, too, was an old friend of our family, and had assisted in obtaining the post-office for my father. He was one of those jovial, courteous old gentlemen of a past generation, who liked to make his own, and every one's life as easy and agreeable as possible, and who had somewhat of an aristocratic contempt for the exacting public,—far less exacting than now. I received a cordial greeting from him, was set down to a good dinner, and forbidden to speak of business until he began, which he did over our wine.

"Now, Harry, just tell me all about it as shortly as possible," said Mr. Talbot; and I obeyed him.

"But this is a dence of a mess!" he exclaimed, when I had finished. "The will must be found, sir. The authorities insist upon it, and I will not answer for the consequences if there is much longer delay. Do you know what your townsmen are saying, my boy?"

His manner had changed from consternation to anger, and then into compassion, as he spoke; but I only looked into his friendly face and shook my head in reply.

"They say just this," he continued, "neither more nor less,—that the will is in your own possession. They say you are going to marry Parson Lawrence's only daughter, and by keeping back the will you expect him to come into possession of all the property."

"I should be a fool if I did," I answered, stammering; for this phase of my position had not failed to occur to me.

"A confounded fool," he added dryly; "the estate will be thrown into Chancery, and the lawyers will get the best pickings out of it. Come, Harry, we are old friends; I knew you when you were a baby, and your father and mother years before. You might tell me anything, my boy."

"Thank you," I cried, grasping his offered hand, "but I have nothing more to tell. I swear I know no more about the will than you do."

"Could anybody else know of its being in your office besides you and the clerks?" asked Mr. Talbot.

Strange to say, — so strange that I marvelled at it myself, — until that moment I had altogether forgotten, or it had been kept back from recurring to my memory, that Katie had been with me when my mother's agonized voice called to me. Like some vivid revelation made by a flash of lightning, lurid and blinding, came back the position in which we stood, and the last words I had uttered. The events which followed had been so hurried and engrossing, the sleep succeeding to them so exhausting, that the impression must have been, for the time, almost obliterated. It returned all the keener now; and my pulse stood still, and my heart sank heavily. Katie had been there; Katie had seen her uncle's will; I had left her behind me in the office alone.

I answered incoherently, stammered, contradicted myself, and at last, for almost the only time in my life, fairly burst into tears. Never did a poor, weak wretch appear more guilty than I did. My friend — for he was truly my friend — urged me, implored of me, in vain, to confess all, and make him the confidant of my temptations and my fault; he gave it no harsher a name. It was impossible for me to cast a suspicion upon Katie, though, as I came to think quietly over it in my bedroom, — I stayed all night at Mr. Talbot's, — I could not banish from me the dread misgiving that here lay the solution of the mystery. I said to myself that at first it would be nothing but a girl's thoughtless curiosity which had changed into shame and terror upon facing the consequences of her action; and that every day had made it more impossible for her to own her fault. Then returned powerfully to me the fascination the mere sight of the will had exercised over me, and the conjectures which had rushed to my brain as I sat staring at it. A tenth part of such a temptation, I was inclined to argue, would be too strong for the curiosity of a woman, especially a woman the most deeply interested in its contents. Yet Katie was so good, so simple-minded, so religious; should I be forced to lose my faith in her? No; I could not believe her capable of a dishonorable and criminal action. Yet where, then, was the will?

It will be readily credited that I did not sleep that night, and that I was haggard and miserable-looking in the morning. The surveyor made a last effort to gain my confidence, and my agitated reserve produced upon him the impression that I was guilty. The last sentence he uttered, with unusual sternness, was to the effect that unless the will was speedily found, there was no hope of my retaining my office, even if my father kept his, being shielded by his dangerous illness at the time.

I rode homewards, wretched enough, and found Snape awaiting my return. Mr. Grey had gone back to London, after staying no more than a few days in Thornbury.

"Nothing discovered yet?" said Snape.

"Nothing," I answered, despondently. "If there was, you'd have no need to come to me. I should be only too glad to let you know."

"It beats everything in my professional experience," he continued.

"That's no satisfaction to me," I said, in a testy tone; "the question is, what is to be done if the will does not turn up at all?"

"The very question all the relatives are asking," replied Snape. "Mr. Lawrence drew up the will himself, gave me no hint of its contents, and has left no copy. We are, every one of us, utterly in the dark as to his intentions. We cannot proceed as if he had died intestate; all the world knows he did not; and no one has a legal right to touch a penny of his property."

"Will it be thrown into Chancery?" I asked.

"There will be nothing else for it, if the will is not found," he said; "and, to let you into a secret which concerns you, some of the relatives are talking of a prosecution against you. But I ask them, What proof have you that Mr. Henry Slaney has abstracted this document? The abstraction of any letter or packet from the Post-Office is felony, such letter or packet being the property of the Postmaster-General during its transit, and the penalty is penal servitude or transportation. But how can the felony be proved? There may be good grounds for suspicion, strong presumptive evidence, — his own admission of having received the document, and a sufficient motive; but there is no positive proof, and could be no positive proof, unless it was found in his possession, or proved to have been in his possession, or in the possession of some individual who could only have received it from him."

"It's a pleasant position to be in," said I, biting at my nails viciously, which is no habit of mine, but which seemed to come naturally to me in these circumstances.

"If the will could only be found," answered Mr. Snape, with a provoking significance of tone, "all might be smoothed over even now."

"If it could only be found!" I said, over and over again, to myself. As soon as the solicitor was gone, I went up stairs to my mother's usual sitting-room. My father had that morning been pronounced well enough to leave his room for a few hours, and he was sitting in an easy-chair near the fire, with a faint smile upon his sunken face, which grew stronger when he saw me. It was a little brightness in the deepening gloom closing around me, and I forced a smile to my own lips.

"All going on well down stairs, Harry?" he said.

"Why not?" I answered, evasively, "why not? The work is simple enough."

He was easily satisfied about that, but not so easily about myself. What had I been over to Mr. Talbot about? What made me look so pale and anxious? Was there any coolness between Katie and me?

"She is a girl after my own heart," said my father, warmly, "a perfect treasure. Don't you let her slip through your fingers, Harry. By the by, now we are alone, tell me how poor Lawrence made his will, and what he has done for Katie, — something handsome, I hope? Your mother would not let me speak about it, for fear of excitement."

I hesitated for a moment but so briefly that he did not notice it.

"The will cannot be found," I said.

"Not found!" he repeated.

"Yes," I continued, hurriedly, "but every search is being made for it. Snape is positive that there was a will executed a few months ago, but all he knows of its contents is, that you and Mr. Grey are the executors."

"Poor Lawrence!" sighed my father. "Do you think they have searched his laboratory well? It is not unlikely he would deposit it there, in his cabinet. Tell them to leave no corner unsearched in the laboratory."

I promised to do so, and made haste to get away. In the drawing-room I found Katie, in her mourning dress and bonnet, come in to go a walk with my sisters, who luckily had just started off before her arrival. She advanced to meet me with both her hands stretched out, and with her usual frank, pleasant, calm smile upon her face. There was no one there, and I stooped down to kiss her, feeling myself an unhappy guilty wretch, as if I were the culprit, and unworthy to lay my lips upon her smooth fair forehead, which grew rosy with my kiss.

"Harry!" she murmured in a tone of remonstrance.

"I am so miserable, Katie," said I; and on the instant I resolved to lay before her my position, to exaggerate it even, to paint it in the blackest colors; and then to make it plain to her that, could the will be found, all might yet be explained away, and smoothed over, without any public exposure. I did my best, and acquitted myself so well that she shed torrents of tears, her head resting upon my shoulder; but not a syllable did she utter which in the slightest degree hinted or betrayed that she had any knowledge of the missing will.

"Katie," I said, when I had exhausted all my eloquence, "you understand that no one now will come into possession of your uncle's property?"

"No one!" she cried, lifting up her head, and looking earnestly in my face. "I thought, if there was no will, my father would have everything. You said he was heir-at-law, and I should be a great heiress. It will not signify if you do lose your situation, Harry; I shall have enough for us both; and, if every one in the world thought you guilty, I should know you were innocent."

"But it will be thrown into Chancery instead of coming to anybody," I said, a cold, hard feeling towards her creeping over me.

"But Chancery could do nothing, after all, but give the landed property to my father," she persisted; "there can be no nearer heir, and if the will is lost, it is the same as there being no will,—if Chancery has any sense," she added, half gayly.

Very heavy indeed grew my heart. I attempted again to impress upon her the position in which her father, herself, and all the relatives stood; but she either could not understand it, or would not believe it. If it came to the worst, she answered, they would all agree to some arrangement for the division of the property, and her father, being the eldest, and the heir-at-law, would receive the largest share. She would be an heiress, and why need I fret myself about a paltry place in the Post-Office?

I could not, for the very life of me, look her in the face and say, "Katie, is it possible that you were over-tempted, and took the will?" Yet I could not shake off the growing conviction that this was the truth. I despair of conveying to you the hundredth part of the maddening conflict of my feelings during the next few weeks,—my love for Kate Lawrence, my disappointment, my strong desire to believe her innocent, my pity for her, my close vigilance upon every word and glance which fell from her, my terror lest the truth should become known to any one else. There could be no suspicion of her in any heart but mine, which loved her so truly, and was willing to endure mistrust, cold looks, and angry insinuations for her sake, yet which every day was growing colder towards her, and more full of severe judgments upon her crime. Expectation was dying away in the town, and hope was almost dead within me.

It was not possible to keep the secret any longer from my father, when he became able to attend to business. A London surveyor, accompanied by a detective, came down to investigate the matter thoroughly; but they could learn no more than was already generally known. It was a severe trouble to my father, and serious consequences threatened him in spite of his plea of sudden and dangerous illness. The fact that he was one of the executors told against him with the strangers who were appointed to investigate the affair; for they appeared to argue, that he might have taken possession of the will, though it was illegal to do so after it had once been posted, and for some reason or other suppressed it, throwing the onus of the loss upon the Post-Office.

When nothing could be discovered by the surveyor or detective, old Lawrence's relatives held a family meeting to consult upon what was to be done. But it was not very clear what the law would permit them to do in such circumstances; and there was not one of them who would have agreed to proceed as if he had died intestate. Every lawyer in Thornbury had given some opinion, and received a fee for it, upon the point; but nothing was clear and certain.

Those were the most miserable three months that ever passed over my head. The changed faces of my townsmen, the suspicion attaching to me, and the near prospect of ignominiously losing my post, were hard to bear. But the deepening conviction of Katie's guilt, and my gradually decreasing love for her, were incomparably harder. She did not fail to feel the coldness and distrust of my manner, and being a girl of spirit she did not fail to mark the change by a corresponding change in herself. I pondered over such questions as these,—how was the will made, and what had she done with it? Had she destroyed it? Or was it still in existence, to be discovered, perhaps, at some future day to work a just judgment upon her? However it might be, I knew that my Katie was lost to me forever; yet not for worlds would I throw upon her the burden of suspicion which weighed so heavily upon me.

The last day of the year came. There had been a semi-official letter in the morning from Mr. Talbot, intimating that the people of Thornbury were dissatisfied at my retaining an important and confidential place in the Post-Office, and that their complaints were about to be noticed from headquarters. My father, only partially recovered, was very low, and my mother and sisters cried at intervals during the day. I found myself, as usual, in the office about the same hour in the evening as when old Lawrence's will was brought in and laid before me on the counter, just as I had finished and folded up the quarterly money-order account. Another quarter was ended, and I said, with some bitterness of tone, "that there could be no objection to me making up the account once again." The forms upon which they were drawn out were kept in a small drawer in the counter, and I found them packed rather tightly, having evidently been pushed in in some haste and confusion. The drawer would only open with a sharp jerk, and as I gave it, I heard a sound of something falling behind, while the drawer came out in my hand. I stooped to look what had fallen, and — you will have guessed already — there lay old Lawrence's will, looking precisely as it had done when it lay on the counter before me, directed to "R. Grey, Esq., Mitre Buildings, The Temple, London."

I gave a great shout, which made my father spring up from his desk, and I fell down on my knees before the empty space where the drawer had been, scarcely able to stretch out my hand to touch the will. How it had got there was plain enough to me. I had left it lying amongst the forms, which were not unlike it in shape and size, and the clerks, coming in to their hurried and unaccustomed work, had cleared the counter after a summary fashion, by sweeping them all away together into the drawer beneath, which was used for no other purpose, and never opened except on the last days of March, June, September, and December. It had been lying there all the while, under my hand a score of times a day, while I had been suffering one of the bitterest conflicts a man can suffer for it.

When I looked round, with the will in my trembling hand, there stood my father and the two clerks from the outer office, who had rushed in on hearing my shout, while through the door which they had left open, a lucky unit of the public surveyed the scene.

"Old Lawrence's will!" I gasped, and the unit immediately darted into the streets to proclaim the discovery.

Almost before I could recover my voice, which sounded choked and unnatural in my own ears, or had risen from my knees and picked up the fallen drawer, the outer office was invaded by a crowd of excited and anxious inquirers, some of whom pressed into our sanctum, and began shaking hands with me in that frenzy of good-will and congratulation which now and then breaks out among the sympathizing public.

Old Lawrence's relatives were not long behind their townspeople; they came in agitated numbers, Katie and her father among them, with Mr. Grey, who had been spending his Christmas at Thornbury. She looked pale, and my heart smote me for my base, treacherous, insane suspicions of her. She neither glanced at me nor spoke to me, and when my father invited all the relatives and Mr. Snape to go on into the house, she passed me, as I stood humbly at the door, with averted eyes and a high dignified carriage.

As both Gray and Snape were present, it was unanimously agreed that the will should be opened and read upon the spot. Several persons, with no immediate interest in it, had made their way into our drawing-room, and as nobody seemed inclined to turn them out, I also remained, standing against the fireplace, and watching steadfastly for some glance from Katie's eyes.

Mr. Snape opened the will sharply, and started off at reading it, with none of his professional deliberation and delay, but as if he was as eager to get at its contents as any person present. It was a short document, and did not take many minutes to get through at the pace he read it. The property was worth about £70,000; thirty thousand of which was left in legacies to old Lawrence's brothers and sister, and the residue bequeathed to the testator's beloved niece, Catherine Lawrence, on the sole condition that she married Henry Slaney, the son of his old friend George Slaney, postmaster of Thornbury. If otherwise, it was to be divided equally among his brothers and sister.

All that followed may easily be guessed. I had to make a thousand protestations of my love, and implore Katie again and again to consent to be my wife, — a thing which we had both taken for granted years before old Lawrence's will was lost in the Post-Office. My situation remained my own, until she relented, which she did not do until by my father's advice I confessed to her the reasons which had caused my change of manner towards her, — the painful suspicions which had thrust themselves upon me, and the bitter sorrow they had produced. We were married at last, to the concealed disappointment and chagrin of her affectionate relatives; and I ceased to be among the number of Post-Office clerks.

OUR SECRET SOCIETY.

A REMINISCENCE OF THE "COUP-D'ÉTAT."

LOUIS CREME, who was nearest the door, ushered out M. Potiron with much civility, and then returned with no less civility to talk to his wife. Camille, whose boldness always forsook him in the face of the adverse sex, remained silent.

"Why, Madame," softly murmured Louis, "how could you think that we wished to overthrow the Republic? On the contrary, we are republicans to the core, and would give women as well as men a vote."

"It's a fact," observed Toupie, tenderly; "so that had we the management of affairs, Madame would have three votes to dispose of, — her own, her husband's, and mine, if she deigned to accept it."

"Then it's not true that you're conspiring to bring back the Bourbons and the white flag?" asked Madame Potiron, timidly.

Maximilien Destouffes cracked his fingers and gave a gaunt chuckle. Camille smiled. The rest of us laughed.

"Mon Dieu! gentlemen," said Madame Potiron, reddening again, but gathering courage, — you understand, I hope, that it's not I who would find anything to say if you brought back the white flag. I think, indeed, any government would be preferable to a republic, where men call one rudely 'citoyenne,' and don't think themselves obliged to take their hats off. To tell you my mind, I'm tired of the equality which makes drunken, swearing workmen in blouses call themselves the equals of you gentlemen, who are always so nice and amiable; and I don't think much of the fraternity that makes people go out and shoot each other every six months in the streets, as they did when they killed poor Monseigneur Affre, our archbishop. I'm told, too, that the Count de Chambord is very handsome and generous; so that I should n't be at all sorry to see him come back. But you know what it is. We women can't have our way; and that horrible inspector says that the Prince President wants to give France liberty and riches and happiness, and to make everybody prosperous and contented, only that you gentlemen, and a good many others like you, won't let him. He says that you want to get up some more of those terrible street-fights, and to massacre everybody, and to make us poor women cry as we did in 1848, when at every corner we met men carrying the dead bodies of mere boys and children who had been shot down on the barricades. . . . Once again, gentlemen, all this is n't true, is it?"

This little speech cast a decided chill into our small circle. Louis looked down and played uneasily with his kept. Toupie appeared to have taken sudden interest in the movements of an erratic spider. Maximilien, Cascarot, and I looked sheepish, — there is no other word for it. A moment's pause followed, and was broken by Camille, who came forward pale but determined, and said, —

"Madame, the spy who spoke to you to-night was one of many who are prowling about at this minute to scatter falsehoods as the Devil did the tares. The only true thing he told you was that we are preparing for street-fights; but these fights will not be of our seeking; and if women cry and children are carried dead through the streets, the blame must rest elsewhere than with us. There is mischief brewing, and the mouchards you see hovering about now are like those ill-omened birds who flutter over the sea just before a hurricane. No doubt your inspector will come again, for he must be going the rounds of the cafés, to prevail upon good-natured people like you, Madame, to denounce those villains who are preventing the Prince President from rendering us happy, rich, and prosperous. It seems there are plenty of these villains about; and one of these mornings you may have the satisfaction of hearing that a few shiploads of them have been sent to a pleasant coast in South America, where they die, as they deserve, of yellow fever. When, therefore, you see the inspector again, pray tell him what I have just said; and add that there are six of us here who are indeed wrong-headed enough to be mistrustful of schemes for universal happiness which have such men as himself for their apostles. Advise him too that if the safety of the Republic is the only thing he quakes for, he may go home to his bed and sleep in peace. In a few days hence, when the Republic is really in danger, we will send for him if he likes, and he shall fight side by side with us on one of those barricades, which — I regret it for your sake, Madame — will not be erected for the Comte de Chambord."

Upon this Camille caught up his cloak, bowed hurriedly to the bewildered Madame Potiron, and went out, followed by Toupie, Maximilien, and Cascarot. Louis lingered a little behind, and taking Madame Potiron's hand to shake it, held it longer in his than perhaps the matter required. "Why is it, Madame," he said, gently, "that you should so dislike republics? Is it not a noble thing to see a country where all men are equal and all men free?"

"O yes!" she sighed, "if all republicans were like you; but they're not. O Monsieur l'officier," she continued, half-serious, half-smiling, "young men, brave, handsome, and courtly, should be marquises or earls. They should have all that is rich and splendid, — marble palaces, liveried servants, fine horses, gold, silk, jewels, great names, and beautiful women. Do you know, when I hear bright, well-born young men praise the people, and call the low riff-raff of the street their brothers, I feel inclined to say what I do when I find young girls wishing for husbands."

"And what is that?"

"Well, just this: You don't know what they are."

IV.

That night Camille and I sat watching by the open window of my studio while Paris slept. But we heard nothing save the periodical tramp of the sergents-de-ville on their beat, and the occasional hurried footsteps of belated citizens. There was not so much as a solitary soldier about, nor could we hear to right or left the call of a single bugle, or the sound of a single police-whistle. It was evident that the perpetration of the President's scheme for making everybody rich and happy at a stroke was adjourned for that night at least, and that we should consequently have time to lay our plans so as not to be caught unawares.

It had been arranged that we should all six meet at eight in the morning to hold a manner of cabinet council previous to commencing operations. Punctually to the time we were gathered together, not a man being absent; and upon comparing notes it was found that even those of the Hexametrists who had not watched had passed a sleepless night. The fact is, our society had been hitherto child's sport, and we were beginning to feel now that it was a serious business, on which we were staking not merely our liberty, but perhaps our lives, or at least our whole life's career.

We accordingly met, looking serious and quiet, though sanguine and resolute. But the same idea had occurred to us all during the night, that on the eve of embarking ourselves on such a desperate venture, we should perhaps do well to consult with one or two Members of the National Assembly, so that there might be homogeneity of action on the day of resistance. Camille had long held out against any scheme of this sort, wishing to share his glory with none; but I talked the matter over with him, and proved that, if all our revolutions in France had as yet resulted in nothing, it was because there had been no uniformity of aim amongst the insurgents and no concord between them. "We shall be weak and isolated," I said, "if we have no supporters in the Assembly. The Montagne party will not know whether we are for them or against them." Camille gave in to these reasons at last, and agreed that we should go and consult with the Deputies Clampin and Riffard, two great pillars of light, whose glory was filling the land. But here Louis stepped in.

"Why not go at once to your own father, Camille, whom I take to be more glorious than either Clampin or Riffard?"

"Yes," said Maximilien, "after all, the Deputy Lange has most right to know what we are about. If the Assembly were attacked, he would be the first whom we should go and protect."

"For that matter," remarked Toupie, "I think Camille's father can, better than anybody, take care of himself; I should be sorry to be the gendarme sent to arrest him. Nevertheless, I'd be shot sooner than see a finger laid upon him."

"Thanks," answered Camille gratefully; and yet he hesitated, having apparently an unconquerable aversion to face the Olympian satire with which M. Demosthenes was wont to receive all schemes that were not of his own making. "I'd really much rather wait before telling my father," he protested nervously. "I think he would be much more likely to think well of us after —"

"After we had all been shot," suggested Toupie. "No, but after we had done something to distinguish ourselves," added Camille.

As most of us were unaware of the amiable characteristics of M. Demosthenes Lange's domestic nature, having never been admitted to the honor of an interview with that hero, we set us to work all five together to demolish Camille's scruples; and succeeded so far, that after an hour's close reasoning, our chief agreed that three out of the six should go and sound the great Deputy, whilst the remaining three should start off without delay to scatter the good seed among the masses. The lots fell upon Toupie and me to accompany Camille; and, so as not to leave the latter time to change his mind, I proposed we should go off at once. Much as such a proceeding was contrary to the true spirit of republicanism, Camille, as I observed, began a most careful toilet out of all the available materials of my wardrobe. Toupie, whose large felt hat was four times as big as his own head, and gave him the appearance of an animated toadstool, cast a rueful look at himself in the glass, and then, possessed himself of a silk hat of mine, which he thought would suit him better.

The only one of us who was dressed as if a king were still on the throne was Louis Crème, who seemed as neat as if he came out of a band-box. "I think you had better come with us, Louis," said Camille, surveying him approvingly; "you will produce a good impression."

"Yes, it won't do to look as if we came to borrow fifty francs," observed Toupie. "That always lends a coolness to the interview."

"Very well," said Louis, "I'll come. Are you all ready?"

"I am," nodded Camille. "Good by, Destouffes and Cascarot; do your best. As soon as we have seen my father, we shall go about proselytizing too. Mind, we all meet as usual at dinner at Mother Riquie's at five. But we must n't go near Potiron's again. For the future we discuss in Henri's studio."

So saying, Camille led the way, and we went down stairs in a body, throwing a good morning, in passing, to Maitre Antoine, our concierge,—a sturdy republican, if ever there was one,—and to his pretty daughter, Miette, who stood upon the doorstep dipping her red lips into a big bowl of milk, not unlikely the milk of a lodger.

When we had walked a few steps, Camille turned round and said, laughingly, "Look there!" pointing, at the same time, to the house where his own lodgings were, about a hundred yards from where we were standing. An individual, evidently doing duty as sentinel, was walking quietly up and down.

"That's my shadow of the past week and my pursuer of last night," he said, concealing himself behind us, so as not to be seen by the functionary.

"So it is; I recognize him," exclaimed Louis; "it's the fellow I held yesterday by the neck. What a pity I did n't pitch him into the river!"

"Regrets are vain," remarked Toupie, sententiously. "All we can do is to pray for strength to act better another time."

v.

There is an electricity in the atmosphere which precedes political storms as oppressive as that which betokens the convulsions of nature. It is a feeling of general uneasiness, a timidity in the looks of men, a still greater timidity in their words, and an almost total paralysis in their powers of action. When there is a revolution or a coup-d'état impending, men are restless. They have no heart for work; they scan each other's faces inquiringly, move about in a purposeless way without knowing why, and pass their time consulting that political barometer, the newspaper. On the morning when Louis, Toupie, and I went, in company with Camille, to call upon the Deputy Lange, Paris was visibly excited by one of those absurd rumors which figured every morning in the papers, but which always found believers, no matter how ludicrous or how impossible they might be.

I forget what the rumor was on this particular occasion, but men were whispering it to each other, with an expression of blank alarm on their faces. Others, less apt to be caught by false news, were conversing no less anxiously as to what they termed the dead calm of the moment. The Moniteur said nothing; the Ministers were silent. Such papers as the Pilori, which peaceful bourgeois passed to each other with looks of consternation, were allowed to talk unmolested,—a sure sign, according to connoisseurs, that something gloomy and terrible was preparing. As we walked we heard the names of the Prince President and M. Thiers, Lamartine and General Cavaignac, the Prince de Joinville and M. de Morny, the Count de Chambord and Berryer, bandied about in a confused jumble, without any rhyme or sense whatever. Here it was said that the leaders of the Assembly were going to seize the President and shut him up at Vincennes; further on, that the Count de Chambord was about to cross the bridge of Kehl with an army of Prussians and Austrians. A wilful grocer asserted, on the contrary, that it was the Prince de Joinville who was going to bombard Cherbourg with an English fleet; whilst a butcher maintained that he was on intimate terms with the public executioner, from whom he had heard that two new guillotines had been ordered by the President, one for the Place du Trône and the other for the Place de la Concorde.

M. Demosthenes Lange lived in the Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin,—which, as everybody knows, is one of the first streets in Paris. I confess it had surprised us somewhat that so democratic a personage as the Deputy Lange should have chosen such a sumptuous street in which to set up his abode. But we were much more surprised on finding that the house he had selected was one of the most splendid in the thoroughfare. A servant in livery was planted at the door, looking all the image of those menials who wait upon the rich in countries governed by tyrants. He eyed us superciliously, and scarcely deigned to make way for us. "Shall I find the Deputy Lange?" asked Camille civilly. "M. Lange? Up the staircase, first floor, door on the right. Ring the bell, and his valet will answer you," rejoined he of the livery, stiffly; and he turned on his heel, Toupie the while making him a low bow, which was evidently accepted as genuine. We crossed a marble vestibule and walked up a staircase, thickly carpeted and adorned with gilt balusters. Louis was growing astonished and Toupie grave. On the landing was a deep bay-window, filled with stained glass, and richly enshrouded in costly winter flowers. The door to the right was of polished oak, and a fine leopard-skin fur was set in front of it in guise of mat. On a small brass plate, that glittered like gold, were the words "Démosthène Lange, Député."

Camille, who had remained impassive, though a little flushed, rang the bell, which gave a discreet aristocratic tinkle. Almost immediately the door was opened, and a superb valet, dressed in black, with a gold scarf-pin and an imposing shirt-collar, stood before us motionless and expectant.

"M. Lange?" said Camille.

"Does not receive so early," was the cold but polite answer.

"I am his son."

"Oh! pardon, Monsieur; be good enough to walk in. I have only recently entered M. le Député's service. I had not the honor of knowing you."

By this time we were prepared for a good deal, and had become dumb as fish; but yet we were not prepared for the sight of M. Demosthenes's apartments, which fairly stupefied us by their splendor. As we subsequently discovered, M. Lange had, during the worst days of 1848, profited by the panic, which had driven all rich people from Paris, to take on an eleven years' lease, for 8,000 francs per annum, a suite of apartments which, at ordinary times, he could not have had for 20,000. There were plenty of such bargains to be picked up by those who were speculative enough to venture upon them. Three fourths of the wealthy houses in the capital were shut up. The rooms held by M. Lange had been tenanted by a Moldavian prince, who had taken the train for Yassy at the first sound of firing. His magnificent furniture, which had cost him 150,000 francs, was bought by Lange for 10,000 francs down, a good sum of money for that agitated period. If only half had been offered, it is very likely the prince would have accepted, for the general opinion of everybody was, that the end of time itself had come, and that, at the rate of an insurrection a week, there would soon be neither houses nor men left standing.

The valet ushered us into an antechamber that reminded one of the Tuileries, and then vanished into an inner room, where ensued the following dialogue:—

"M. Camille Lange, sir."

"My son? What the devil can he want?"

"There are three gentlemen with him, sir."

"Well dressed?" (This was said in a roar that sounded like the bursting of a water-dyke.)

"Not very, sir."

"Humph! I'm going to breakfast. Show them in. I'll talk to them whilst I'm eating."

Camille, who heard all this, colored, and kept his eyes fixed on the door, so as not to meet our glances; he appeared ready to cry from mortification. In a minute the valet returned, and showed us into M. Demosthenes Lange's breakfast-room.

It was a masterpiece, this breakfast-room. The ceiling was dome-shaped, and ornamented with a magnificent painting, signed by one of the best artists of the day. The walls were tapestried with maroon velvet-like paper, bordered by cornices richly sculptured into fancy designs of fruit and flowers, and gilt. Admirable landscape paintings adorned the walls, and in the spaces between them were delicate marble statuettes set on pedestals, backed and covered with crimson velvet. The chairs and sofas were all of red ribbed silk, and the carpet was so thick that one's feet sunk into it as in long grass. A hundred little knick-knacks adorning the chiffonnière and mantel-piece testified that the Moldavian prince, whatever may have been his dislike for gunpowder, was a true friend of art. M. Demosthenes was seated at a table spread with snowy linen and covered with a pâté-de-foie-gras, a mayonnaise of lobster, a dish of côtelettes à la Soubise, and a bottle of Pomard. He was dressed in a cashmere dressing-gown, lined with blue silk; his shirt, open at the collar, showed a throat as vigorous as that of a bull. He was not yet shaved. His legs were cased in flannel trousers, and his feet were loosely shod in sable fur slippers.

"What is it?" he asked, holding out one finger to his son, but taking no notice of the rest of us. "What do you want? I tell you at once I've got no money."

"I don't want money," replied Camille, quietly. "I—that is, we—have come to ask you whether you know that the Republic is in danger?"

"Republic in danger!" blurted out the Deputy with his mouth full. "Who put such tomfoolery as that into your head?"

"Citizen Deputy," said Louis Crème, throwing a tinge of irony into his voice, "there is a rumor in Paris that the President intends seizing some of the foremost Deputies and locking them up. In prevision of such an event we are here to say that we, your very obedient servants, are going to fight for you."

"What's your name?" bellowed M. Lange, taking up a cutlet with his fingers and gnawing it fiercely.

"Before the Republic I used to be Count de Crème," answered Louis, smiling; "at present I am Louis Crème, simply."

"Ugh!" grunted the Deputy. "I've small opinions of counts. I don't believe any good ever came of them. Such as you see me, I was a blacksmith and wielded the sledge-hammer. I'll lay odds there are not three picked men who could stand up against me in the whole Faubourg St. Germain."

"It's a pity merit is n't measured by strength of biceps, or else, Citizen Deputy, you would certainly be elected President," observed Toupie, who could not for the life of him have withstood a joke.

The Deputy seemed to accept this as a compliment.

"Who are you?" he growled.

"My name is Horace Toupie, and I am studying to be a doctor. But if I had had the shaping of my destiny, I should have much preferred being a blacksmith, and owning apartments in the Chaussée d'Antin."

This time the epigram went a little deeper. The ex-blacksmith gave a kind of grunt and harpooned another cutlet. "A pretty blacksmith you'd have made," he said, and then turned to me. "What are you?" he asked. "A sucking doctor too?"

"No," I replied, laughing; "a painter."

"Well," exclaimed the Deputy, licking some sauce off his fingers, "I can't make out what you want with me. You're as thin, the four of you, as lucifer-matches. Here, Baptiste," (this was to his servant), "bring in four glasses and a bottle of cognac. You'll take a drink, the lot of you, and then go about your business. Sit down. Chairs are meant to be sat upon; there are enough of them and to spare."

Baptiste came in bearing four tumblers and a bottle of cognac on a silver tray. M. Lange filled each of the tumblers to the brim, knocked his glass against ours, and said laconically, "There you are, drink."

Louis, whose St. Cyr training had well seasoned him for cognac-drinking, tossed off his measure in three draughts. The blacksmith bellowed his approval.

"That's good. A blacksmith would n't have taken his lips from the glass; but it's well drunk for a count. Look at Camille there. You wouldn't think he was a whelp of mine. He shirks his liquor as if it were boiling pitch."

Camille had just sat down. At his father's taunt he got up, took his glass from the table and swallowed its contents at a toss. "And now," he said, calmly, "I think we had better begin what we've got to say; for in a few minutes I shall be drunk."

This made the blacksmith grin, but it also made him listen. Camille, Louis, Toupie, and I told him between us, in a rambling sort of fashion, all we had heard and what we had planned. We spoke of the police watchings, the rumors of a coup-d'état, and the increase of troops in the Paris garrison. We explained all the designs of the Hexameton, its ramifications among the workmen and students; and growing excited under the fumes of the cognac, we declared our fixed intention of dying for the Assembly if need be, and setting fire to the four corners of Paris. To our dismay and horror, M. Lange, instead of showing himself touched, shrugged his shoulders contemptuously, and told us point-blank that we were four young fools; that a coup-d'état was an absurd invention of some of those confounded scribblers who were always imagining humbug, and that the President would as soon think of laying a hand on the Assembly as he would think of ramming his head into a hornet's nest. "Why, bones and thunder!" concluded the popular hero, "if he were to try any tricks of that sort, I'd go to the Elysée and shake him myself by the throat until all his teeth fell out."

We had reached the argumentative stage of drunkenness, and so continued to battle fiercely. This roused M. Demosthenes, who began to drink cognac too, and to roar like a buffalo. Another bottle was sent for, the glasses were replenished, the arguments waxed closer and hotter, and soon the room resembled nothing so much as the National Assembly on a day of excitement, every man hollaing his loudest, and paying no attention to his neighbor. After ten minutes of this, M. Demosthenes was left master of the field, we four having lapsed into the maudlin stage. According to the fashion of Homer's warriors, shouting a psalm over the bodies of their prostrate foes, he then indulged in a soliloquy: "What! a coup-d'état? and I, a representative of the people, thrown into prison, and caged like a rat! Why, these young boobies talk of the thing as if I had no more blood in my veins, or muscles in my arms. Police, police! What do I care for the police? Has nobody ever seen the Deputy Demosthenes Lange walk through the streets followed by the people, who pointed to him and shouted, 'There goes our champion'? Bones and thunder! with a call to arms I could rouse all the people of the Faubourgs in a day, and demolish the Elysée, until there was not so much as a stone left to grind a knife on. Have they forgotten '48, when I led the sacking of the Duc de Croissant's castle, and clove the head of the big gendarme Michon in two halves, like an apple? Have they forgotten that it was I who stirred up the villagers to lynch the farm-bailiff, and lent one of the ropes of my forge to hang him with? Why, the people of Paris know me as if I was their father. They know that I am republican to the backbone; and that if ever the Republic stood in danger, I would defend it with the last drop of my blood, even though all the rest of the country were to turn renegades, and I were to be

This last assurance was made with so much conviction that Toupie at once began to weep, declaring that if ever the Deputy wanted anybody to die with him he had only to send to No. 117 Rue de l'Ecole de Médecine, and that he, Toupie, would arrive without loss of time.

But this promise failed to appease M. Demosthenes, who rose and paced about the room furiously, stopping at last in front of Camille, and bellowing to him at the top of his voice: "You little pale-faced goose! you told me that the police were dogging you. Why are they dogging you? Lead me to the policeman who's dogging you, and I'll settle him. You'll see!"

"It's for the Pilori," hiccupped poor Camille, who was gazing with a beate expression at the ceiling.

"The Pilori! and it's for that you've taken alarm, and come and disturbed me at breakfast! Why, what can they do to you, ninny? I've read your Pilori. It's as weak as mutton-broth. Hang me, if I should n't have thought it was written by epileptic parrots in the intervals of a fit. Bah! if you want an article for the paper, I'll write you one that'll make the cats on the housetops jump, and bring more policemen after you than would stretch in an Indian file from here to the coast of Normandy. Come, run away, all of you. I'm tired of this. When I was your age, thank Heaven! I could have trimmed any policeman who would have followed me in such a way that he would have been careful how he chose his beat another time! Come now, be off!"

But this was easier said than done. Camille was staring at his father with a vacant look, and rolling his head to and fro in an utterly dejected manner. Toupie had slid off his chair on to the ground, and was weeping bitterly at the idea that the Deputy should talk of dying without him. Louis was asleep; and I, the most sober perhaps of the company, was lying all of a heap doubled up on the sofa, and groaning aloud that there was an earthquake.

"You're a pretty band of republicans!" muttered M. Lange, indignantly. "I should like to know how much gunpowder you could stand if you're floored by a few thimblefuls of this weak stuff. Here, Baptiste, look at this. What's to be done? I'm hanged if they're not all as drunk as Poles."

Baptiste came in, tried in vain to induce Toupie to stand up, and then went out to fetch a big sponge and a basin of water, with which he began to bathe our faces. But the blacksmith had no patience with such mild treatment. "Here," he shouted, "this is the way to do it!" And he poured the whole basinful of water over the head of Toupie, who sneezed and coughed piteously under the infliction. "Now, then," he added, "let's carry the others one at a time, and put their heads under the kitchen-tap, beginning with this hobbledohoy of a count. You catch hold of his legs; I'll take his arms."

Twenty minutes of this energetic hydropathy acted with effect enough to make us know where we were. Putting our joint stock of equilibrium together, we had just sufficient to enable us to stand up leaning one against the other; only, when we tried to move, the machinery went all wrong and we fell flat in different directions. Seeing it was useless to expect that we could walk home, the blacksmith sent for a cab and helped us down the on us as he did so, and railing bitterly at us for not being blacksmiths. When we were all packed together in the cab—

"Where shall I take 'em to?" asked the driver.

"O, that's your look-out!" growled M. Demos-thenes. "Here's a five-franc piece. Take 'em to the Elysée to call on the President; they want to pick a bone with him." And he vanished, shrugging his shoulders.

The valet Baptiste dipped his hand into my pocket to find an address of some kind, and pulled out a letter.

"I suppose this is their address," he said; "Rue de l'Ecole de Médecine, 117. You'd better drive there."

VI.

I have no distinct recollection of what immediately followed. I have a sort of dim vision of a cab pulling up before a door, where there was a crowd of people laughing at us; of old Antoine, my concierge, coming out with the pretty Miette, and clasping his hands in astonishment; of determined efforts to haul us out and lift us up to my studio on the sixth floor; and of loud laughter on the part of Mdlle. Miette when she saw that for every step we climbed we tumbled down two. Then the scene changes, and I fancy I can see four prostrate individuals rolling about on the floor, amidst mahlsticks, palettes, broken color-boxes, easels overturned, and pictures smashed, and exhorting each other loudly not to desert the Republic. This scene must have lasted some time, for twilight closed upon it; and I remember two faces, as those of Maximilien Des-ouffes and Hugues Cascarot, contemplating us with speechless wonder. Then there was presumably another change; for I find four haggard faces seated round a table and trying to convince two more that there has been nothing whatever the matter with them. The conversation turns suddenly upon barricades and tyranny. Pathetic assurances of undying fidelity are interchanged, the Marseillaise is sung, and, as a proof that they are not at all upset, the four haggard faces resolve upon setting out at once to rouse the citizens of Paris, and warn them of the plots being laid against their freedom. The next scene is in the open air after nightfall, and tumultuous in its aspects. There is a crowd, a frantic uproar, six figures gesticulating and haranguing the multitude, a surge, a struggle, the appearance of a dozen cocked hats, an attempt at flight, a violent scuffle, a mêlée of screams and blows, a sharp rap on the head, and then—I remember no more.

* * * * *

When reason and the perception of facts were restored to me, I was lying stretched at full length on the damp floor of a place dimly lighted by a small window closely grated with iron. It was a room about twenty feet square, with whitewashed walls covered with hundreds of inscriptions in pencil and burned cork. There was no furniture—nothing but a narrow form running all round the room and fastened to the walls with clamps of iron. I rubbed my eyes, leaned on my elbow, and looked about me. I was not alone—far from it. The room was as full as it could hold. Three or four workmen in blouses lay snoring and apparently dead drunk. A soldier, deprived of shako and sword, was in the same happy condition. Two very sinister-looking individuals were smoking side by side on the form, with their hands in their pockets. Around me my five comrades of the Hexameton lay reclining in various attitudes suggestive of unquiet slumbers.

We were at the police-station; in other words, we were prisoners.

Perhaps it may be as well to state what is the French method of procedure with people who have been arrested in the night. They are taken to the station and cast all together, thieves and drunkards, murderers or brawlers, into a place of delight called the violon, where they abide until seven in the morning, at which hour they are examined by the commissaire de police. If the charge be only a light one, the commissaire may discharge the prisoner at once, provided the latter sends to some friend to come and claim him. If, on the contrary, the charge be a serious one, then the prisoner returns to the violon, and waits until the "panier-à-salade," or prison-van, comes to fetch him to the Prefecture. This is generally about nine o'clock. Every morning at eight a dozen vans leave the Rue de Jérusalem and go the round of the different stations, gathering up the black sheep for the big fold. At the Prefecture, prisoners are lodged according to their means. If they can afford it they have a cell to themselves, paying two francs a day for the privilege. This is called la pistole. If they are not sufficiently well off to afford a cell, they are turned loose into a big common room in company with a few score other prisoners awaiting their trial. There are two of these common rooms. One is for the utterly disreputable, who are in rags and tatters; the other for people who are clean and orderly. The common room is at once a dining-room, sleeping-room, and recreation yard. At night beds are laid down in it; during the day the prisoners pace up and down, two or three together, or singly, as they choose. Sometimes a prisoner remains three or four months in this common room—(that is, in technical language, au dépôt)—never leaving it but to go between two gendarmes to the cabinet of the juge d'instruction, or examining magistrate, whose interrogatories are always conducted in private.

If I give these details, it is because as soon as I awoke and discovered where I and my unlucky friends were, I guessed at once that we were not likely to be let loose that day, nor possibly for many days to come. The charge against us would not be one of common drunkenness, but, probably, one of street-rioting, assault, and battery; or, perhaps, even one of sedition and treason-felony. Struck with horror at our position, I roused my comrades to take counsel, and in a few minutes' time we were sitting in a circle, with dismal looks, scarcely believing that what we saw and felt could be real. We had no time to lose, for the dawn had fully set in, and it was needful that we should agree between us as to what we should say when questioned by the commissaire. It was decided upon at once that we should, in the interests of the Hexameton, resolutely eat whatever words of treason we might have uttered in our ravings of the night before. We were to declare ourselves devoted to the President, and ascribe all our utterances to tipsiness. It cost us much heart-burning to resolve upon this course; but, as Toupie sagely remarked, the freedom of a whole nation must not be sacrificed because four boobies had chosen to get drunk. The one who felt most sensitively on this point was Camille, who would have to declare his name, and see the son of the great tribune Lange figure on the police-sheet in the capacity of ragamuffin. It seemed he had been awake for a couple of hours, and crying all by himself at this humiliating thought. Louis Crème, who might with equal reason have objected to see the descendant of a crusader placed in the same category, bore his reverses with more philosophy, treating the matter rather as a joke than otherwise.

Whilst we were still deliberating in whispers, so as not to be overheard by the two sinister persons smoking,—who might, for all we knew, be moutons,*—there was a grating of bolts outside, the door opened, and a head, covered with a cocked hat, peeped in. "Now then," shouted a gruff voice, "come along one of you, no matter which."

This was the signal that M. le Commissaire had arrived, and was waiting to begin his examinations. We allowed the two smokers, the workmen, and the soldier to stagger out first. They all came back as they had gone, but with different expressions on their faces. The two smokers were a pair of thieves, and had a prospect of long captivity before them. The soldier was looking forward to a month's imprisonment for having slept out of barracks. Two of the workmen knew that they would be liberated within an hour or so, and were demonstratively jubilant; but a third, who was more hopelessly tattered and more profoundly drunk than either of the others, came back with a look of stoical recklessness on his face, and, to our infinite stupefaction, held out his hand to the lot of us collectively, hiccoughing, "Well, never mind—you're go—good fellows, and—and I do—on't mind being in the same b—boat with you."

"What do you mean?" we asked, recoiling from his embraces.

"Why, don't you kn—know?" he grinned, catching abruptly hold of Toupie's shoulder for support, and reeling heavily into the midst of us. "Why, it's p—plain enough! When I heard you l—last n—night crying, 'Vive le p—peuple! A bas le P—président!' I said, 'That's my s—sort'; and I shouted with you. And now it seems we shall be s—sent to Toulon, but I d—don't mind, for I—I l—l—l—like the look of you."

We all burst into a cold perspiration, which was not diminished by the fact that our drunken accomplice insisted noisily upon hugging us all round in the name of the Republic, one and indivisible. But our terror reached its climax when, after staggering helplessly about and trying to steady himself against the slippery walls, the republican workman lurched forward and rolled on to the floor, blurring out, "Vive la l—liberté. Vive le—le Hex—hex—heza—m—métron!"

This sounded like a death-knell upon us; but before we could say anything to one another the cocked hat again appeared and shouted, "Now, then, the next!" and as I was the nearest to the door, a hand was laid on my shoulder and I was pushed with more speed than ceremony down a stone-flagged passage into the presence of the commissaire.

The name of this official was M. Fouinard. He was small, important, curt in his speech, and lost no time in vain courtesies.

"Your name?" he said.

"Henri Lardé."

"Your trade or profession?"

"Painter, 117 Rue de l'Ecole de Médecine."

"You're a drunkard, it seems?"

"No, M. le Commissaire. I am really very sorry. Yesterday was an exceptional day. It's the first time it has ever happened to us. A friend had offered us some cognac; but I promise it shall not occur again."

"No. I don't think it will," answered M. Fouinard dryly, "not for a good while, at least. The charge against you is for exciting the citizens to rebellion against the Government. You are a member of a secret society called the Hexamétron."

"But, Monsieur—"

"Bah! it's no use denying. This scarlet flag was seized upon you last evening. This morning a domiciliary visit was paid to the rooms of all the six of you, and those papers yonder were found. There is enough evidence there to lodge you in Cayenne for the rest of your days. Your chief is an ill-conditioned young rebel, who writes in a blasphemous paper called the Pilori; the police have for some time had their eye upon him. Two more of your number spent their time yesterday going round inciting workmen and students to be ready to take arms at a given signal. Your pass and counterpass were "Hexa" and "Metron." You must be really a fool, my friend, if you think that among five or six hundred workmen there will not be a dozen or two who have intelligences with the police. Fifteen informations were laid against you in the course of yesterday afternoon. The witnesses are all prepared to swear to what I have said. You see, therefore, your case is as plain as a turnpike-road. The best thing you can do is to make a clean breast of it."

I will spare the reader the melancholy recital of the disasters of that morning. How we were cross-questioned one by one, squeezed (morally) flat as oranges, entangled in our speech, forced into avowals, and sent back crestfallen to the violon after being made to sign a procès-verbal establishing our guilt; how we were extricated from the violon at nine, handcuffed, hoisted into a yellow prison-van, stowed into cells where we had not room to move, and jolted through the streets of Paris with a mounted municipal trotting behind the vehicle to see that none of us escaped through the skylight; how we were stripped at the Préfecture, searched, measured, weighed, put into a bath, deprived of our money, and finally cast into a big stone-paved room, where fifty-three prisoners of various classes were already wandering about in desponding wretchedness:—all these things are written vividly on my memory and no doubt on the memories of my six fellow-captives,—(for the dirty workman was sent with us and inscribed on the police-sheet as one of our Society); but the remembrance of them is not such as any of us would take a pleasure in recalling. Our pride was laid in the dust, our dignity was gone. Our noble brotherhood, that was to have regenerated France and made its name known from one end of the country to the other, was torn up by the roots, and we, its six branches, cast bruised and broken into a dust-bin! What could we do but bewail and weep? We sat on a form all six of a row, clasping each other's hands and crying in silence. Through the tall windows opposite, but far above our heads, we could see glimpses of the clear blue December sky faintly gilded by the tint of the morning sun. Now and then the white clouds chased each other slowly in our sight, and we sat wondering where they were going, and feeling for the first time in our lives what it was to be without liberty; what it was to be shut up in prison, and to envy the freedom of the poorest insects who can grovel humbly and undisturbed. . . .

This lasted a week. Heaven knows how we got over that week, with its monotonous course of weary days. We had no papers to read, knew nothing of what was going on without, had thieves for our companions, and were nourished upon bean-soup served to us twice a day in tin pots. It was almost a relief to us when the yellow-belted gendarmes cried out our names through a trap in the door and led us off to be examined by the juge d'instruction. This happened three times in the seven days. Every fact that could be pumped out of us was pumped. The juge d'instruction who dealt with our case had the eyes of a ferret and a tongue as insinuating as a screw-driver. It would have been useless to prevaricate with him. He caught up our answers before we had uttered them; and had our words fully couched on paper before they had left our mouths. After our first interrogatory he told us we were dangerous conspirators, which struck us dumb, but consoled us somewhat, for if we were to be condemned for conspiracy, better, we thought, to be condemned as dangerous than as harmless traitors. After the second interview he told us we were mischievous apes, which was less flattering. After the next he seemed to have changed his mind and waxed disdainful, observing with a wave of the hand that we should certainly be imprisoned for a few years, but that we were not worth the soup we were eating.

This last insult kindled our blood and revived the flame in us. Up to that time we had been dejected, now we felt our energies renewed, and paced angrily up and down, brooding resentment in our souls, and vowing that we would make sensational speeches in the dock, and so show the world what had been lost by the untimely doom of the Hexametron. The thought of the effect we might produce gave us new energy, and made our spirits rise. We began to talk again as in the old days, exchanging promises of fraternity, and exclaiming that, after all, what had happened to us was not to be deplored, seeing that it would infallibly make us glorious and hand down our names to posterity.

We were greatly cheered too by hearing from some new prisoners who came in that the deeds of the Hexametron had astonished all Paris; that the papers had talked of the six young men who had tried to raise a sedition in the Quartier Latin, and called on the people to come and overturn the President; that the Radical organs had styled us heroes; and that a Cabinet Council had been held about us. After such news as this, it was impossible not to feel that we had towered in a short week to the height of Robespierre and Marat. We began to slouch our hats, to stride solemnly with our arms folded, to eschew the practice of smiling, and had already got into the habit of planting our hands on our breasts, as though daring the enemy to take our lives; when one evening towards five o'clock, we were called—unusual circumstance—all six together, and, without a word of explanation, led through a labyrinth of passages to the well-known room of the examining magistrate. It struck us as peculiar that there was only one gendarme with us.

When we had reached the door, the gendarme knocked and told us to go in, which we did with a look of unutterable dimity on our faces. The juge d'instruction was standing near the fire, and near him, to our surprise, and not a little to our mortification, were the General of the School of Saint Cyr, M. Demosthenes Lange, the two Demoiselles Crème de la Crèmerie, Dr. Toupie, the father of Toupie, MM. Destouffes and Cascarot, seniors, and my own nearest relative.

M. Demosthenes was the first to speak. "You're an imbecile," he said to his son.

The General of Saint Cyr caught hold of Louis by the ear. "You'll be for a month under arrest," he grunted, sternly; "and you may consider yourself lucky you're not expelled."

Toupie, senior, glared at his offspring. "Is this what you call studying medicine?" he asked.

"It's studying bruises," answered Toupie, meekly.

"Well, you're a parcel of simpletons," observed the juge d'instruction. "Because of your good connections, this is going to be treated as a freak. The seven days' imprisonment you've had is enough for a piece of tomfoolery, and the best thing you can do is to go back to your books without frightening yourselves and others with talk of coups-d'état, which are as idiotic as they are idle."

Here was a fall! We followed our progenitors out of the room in perfect silence, but with our fists clenched and rage in our hearts. As soon as we had got outside into the street, Camille's father turned round with a contemptuous frown on his massive face. "If I'd been the judge," he said, "you should all have had a year of it with your heads shaved. To get up a street-row, and to be bagged like weasels,—why, it's contemptible! You see the President does n't even deign to treat you as adversaries. I expect he's made himself a nightcap out of your red flag." Saying this, the blacksmith shrugged his shoulders, as was his wont, and added, with a ferocious bellow, "If there were ever the coup-d'état you speak of, you'd see what I'd do. Bones and thunder! they should n't bag me like a weasel!"

There were declarations to the same effect—minus the bones and thunder—from each of our fathers, and after an hour's sermonizing we were told to go our ways and behave less like fools; Toupie received the gratifying assurance that his allowance would be curtailed, and Louis was given the order to join his school the next morning. It was close upon seven o'clock when we were abandoned to our devices and found ourselves all six walking, ashamed and sulky, towards my lodgings. On the door-step we met my concierge, Antoine, and Mdle. Miette, who laughed, and said she hoped we were better. Antoine looked at us with a droll expression, and remarked that in his day men managed insurrections better than we did. We learned it was untrue that anybody had called us heroes; or, at least, those that had done so lived in the opposite quarters of the city and knew nothing about us. In the Quartier Latin we had become ridiculous. The very cats we passed seemed to wag their heads in derision. A white dog who was sitting in the middle of the road howled so hysterically at our approach that it was obvious he was laughing at us. And to fill the cup of our humiliation to the brim, the Pilori, Camille's own ideal journal, which old Antoine handed to us with an amused grin, contained an editorial holding us up to derision as chicken-hearted conspirators, who had only succeeded in smashing one policeman's hat and two panes of glass.

We shrank up stairs wellnigh prostrate with this last load of obloquy. "Is this to-day's paper?" we asked of Antoine.

"Yes, gentlemen, it's just come in."

We threw a glance at the date: it was "Tuesday, the 2d of December, 1851."

VII.

That night the Prince President put into action his scheme for making everybody happy and prosperous. Whilst the six members of the Hexameton slept, tired out with emotion and extenuated by repeated bursts of indignation, cabs and gendarmes were hurrying about Paris carrying representatives of the people and others to Vincennes and Mazas. It was neatly done; very. Some of the representatives struggled and protested; one or two of the journalists seized showed fight; but the majority of the celebrities arrested resigned themselves to their fate with an equal mind, convinced that resistance would only spoil matters and disturb the quiet of things. It was all managed in perfect good order, without any unseemliness in the way of noise or shouting. When France awoke next morning it heard that half its great men were under lock and key, and that the other half were hiding in stray places, so as not to be put under lock and key too. The first feeling was one of stupefaction; the next one of revolt. Republican Paris glowed at the news of what had been done. By mid-day the streets were full of excited and indignant citizens, who were only restrained from doing the most daring things by the presence of many battalions of soldiers dotted about strategically at different points of the capital.

As the day advanced the crowds increase, growing more and more excited and more and more indignant. Rumors were bruited that such of the representatives as had not been arrested were gathered together and were deposing the President. At every corner were large white placards calling upon good citizens to disperse, and informing people who ventured out of doors with weapons that the military would shoot them on the spot, — all this with a view to making everybody happy and prosperous. . . . Towards three o'clock, after regiment upon regiment had been seen hurrying through the streets with bayonets fixed and cartridge-boxes full, a stray shot, then another, and, finally, a sharp succession of volleys began to be heard. Then workmen and bourgeois, women and priests, dogs, children, and beggars, could be observed rushing affrighted and uttering screams of terror, whilst behind them soldiers laughing at the sport, and bravely commanded, loaded their rifles and sent bullets flying in front of them like hail. After this were seen heaps of dead piled up in thoroughfares where two streets met. Then barricades rose, night came on, and in the dark were heard more volleys, joined to cries of rage, shouts of defiance, quick tramping of feet and frightful oaths, as insurgents and soldiers fought hand to hand amidst crumbling masses of wood and stone. The morning dawned and it was not yet over; the work of making everybody happy was only half accomplished. Some barricades held good with stolid obstinacy, and had to be carried at the bayonet's point after desperate and fearful struggles. Then came the sweeping of cavalry, and after that the sweeping of shot fired by soldiers nearly mad, on the Boulevards. To the dead in blouses were added the dead in silk and kid gloves. Here, a pretty woman who had come out unfinished cigar in his hand, who had been shot down dead in front of a café. A few hours of terror and panic followed, during which the work of happiness progressed. The soldiers were triumphing. Shops were closed, markets abandoned, streets deserted. Occasionally a single scream would ring through the air, as a frightened rebel pursued by soldiers would bound, with his hair wild and his eyes glaring, through a silent thoroughfare trying to find a refuge. Then there would be a halt, a clicking of gun-locks, a clear bang, and the rebel would roll over in the dust, having found his refuge. Towards night such episodes grew rarer, and the soldiers bivouacked in the open spaces of the city, pleased with their day's labor and toasting the President in double rations of wine. Around them the houses were lifeless. There were no lights in the windows. The republicans of the day before were hiding under their beds and in cellars. At odd moments a soldier would send a bullet through a window to hear the glass shiver and make his comrades laugh. A few hours later the telegraph reported that the city was quiet. The Elysée became invaded by visitors who hurried to pay their compliments, and — the work of happiness was completed.

And where was the Hexameton the while? The Hexameton fought. Casting aside the rancors of the evening, it sallied forth in a body as soon as it heard the sounds of firing, and joined in the shouts of the crowd who were crying, that the Republic should not be put down! that Paris would fight to the death! There were prodigies of valor performed during those two days. Three barricades were formed, and only abandoned when the soldiery had fought their way inch by inch over every paving-stone. At the last of the barriers the Hexameton saw two of its members fall. When the numbers were counted it was found that Maximilien the Breton was under a heap of dead; and that poor Toupie was lying — still smiling, and as though asleep — in the foremost place among our outworks. Our red flag — not the first, but a new one already riddled with bullets — served to cover them both, and a Sister of Mercy, who had been tending the wounded silently and bravely like a ministering angel amid the din of the battle, sprinkled holy water over their brows and gently prayed for them.

VIII.

On the 7th of December what remained of the Hexameton was making its way, powder-stained and panting, up the Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin. Camille wanted to learn what had become of his father, and the other three of us had insisted on accompanying him. Knowing how sturdy and honest was the republicanism of the ex-blacksmith, how deep was his love for the people's rights, how stern his hatred of oppression, we feared to learn that he had fallen side by side with the Representative, Baudin, and other of the Radicals who had given their lives for their convictions. His house was deserted. Baptiste, his servant, stood at the door and told us that an attempt had been made to arrest him on the evening of the 2d, but that he had been warned in time, had fled, and had not been seen since. Baptiste thought that he must have been fighting, for he had taken his big stick and a revolver with him.

Camille turned pale, but went away at once, thinking it useless to stay, and we walked back sorrowfully towards the Boulevard, going towards the Place de la Concorde, with the intention of stopping at the Palace of the Assembly and asking if anybody there had heard of the Deputy Lange. In the Rue Royale we were stopped by an immense crowd that choked up the whole of the space between the Madeleine and the Obelisk. Flags were flying from the houses. Gayly dressed women were standing at the windows, with bouquets in their hands ready to throw. People were laughing and smiling. A double row of soldiers was bordering the way, and excited policemen were shouting to the crowds to stand back. "What is it?" we asked. "Who are you waiting for?" "The Prince," answered somebody, joyfully, and our next question was cut short, for suddenly a formidable cheer—deep, continuous, and growing in force as the waves of the sea—started from the corner of the Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré, was caught up on both sides of the street, and spread from the Boulevards to the Place de la Concorde. Hats were thrown up, handkerchiefs were waved, bouquets were showered down; and amidst all this, calm and unmoved, upon a white horse, rode a slight-looking man, with downcast eyes and a thoughtful face, who answered the shouts of welcome with quiet impassive complacency.

This was the author of the scheme for making everybody happy and prosperous. Around him fervent supporters, who had broken through the lines of soldiers, were rending the air with their shouts. There were deputies, guards, journalists, dandies,—all republicans of the eve, Bonapartists of the morrow; and foremost among them who should we see, waving his hat the most fiercely, vociferating the loudest, and clapping his hands most enthusiastically, but M. Demosthenes Lange!

There was a thrill amongst us, and then Louis exclaimed, suddenly, "I say, here, Henri, help! hold up Camille: he has fainted!"

IX.

What remains is soon told. As most people are aware, M. Demosthenes Lange was shortly after appointed a senator. He now calls himself Count de Lange, and wears yellow kid gloves, which are specially made for him (large "tens," with double seams). It is one of his greatest regrets that the "good times" of the second empire are passing, and that the people are growing daily more factious and more exacting. M. le Comte de Lange is of opinion that nothing will ever be done with France unless there is a new coup-d'état periodically on the 2d of December every ten years, and it is only fair to add that there are plenty of his colleagues who agree with him.

M. de Lange, however, is not the only one upon whom the cycle of years and events has worked some change of opinion. After 1851 the four surviving members of the Hexametron lost sight of one another, each going his own way on different roads of life. They met again, however, a few weeks ago, and by a mere chance, at a dinner given by one of his Majesty's senators, a Marquis, and one of the most witty men in Paris. They were announced successively by the footman as "M. le Colonel Comte de Crème," "M. le Vicomte Camille de Lange," "M. le Baron de Cascarot," and "M. de Lardé." Camille was a secretary of legation at the court of the grand Duke of Saxe-Gutta-Percha; Cascarot was a Prefect; your humble servant sported a small scarlet rosette at his button-hole. The four looked at each other, colored a little, and then laughed.

Perhaps they would have felt embarrassed as to what to say, but happily the butler entered at that moment announcing, "Madame la Marquise est servie." And we all went in to dinner.

THE AFFAIR OF THE RED PORTEFEUILLE.

THE red portefeuille in question was a certain red morocco note-case. How, in the Rue de Jérusalem, it became "an affair," was the story its owner told us. And on this wise.

"It was safe enough," Dick Langley said, "in my inner breast-pocket when I left Spa that morning; and it was safe there too when I reached the Nord terminus that evening. But I had not been five minutes in my customary quarters at the Grand before I discovered that my note-case was most indubitably—gone—looted quietly, you know. The how was that clean cut through the bottom seam of the pocket; the where must have been in the crowd at the station just now.

"I don't profess to be much of a judge of this sort of thing; but it struck me at the time that the fellow who had operated on me must have been about the top of his profession,—so scarcely perceptible was the solution of continuity in my garment, so absolutely unconscious had I been of his propinquity. Still, I had lost some fifty thousand francs' worth of French bank paper, not one sou whereof was I likely to see again. So that it was with feelings of not wholly unadmired admiration that I was examining the traces of the spoiler's handiwork when the door opened and some one came into the room.

"I looked up, expecting to see Vere Lucingham. Vere was Second Secretary here then; an incorrigible farceur, who had, as such, a 'difficulty' with some victimized native to settle next day;—which business had brought me up from the Bad. But it was not Vere on whom the door had just closed.

"It was a slight, wiry little man, with his black hair cut close to his bullet head, with a sallow face shaved blue, and a keen, cool eye that took everything in the room in at a glance, and then rested upon me as though I was precisely the person its owner wished and expected to behold. In fact, I fancied the little man muttered as much to himself.

"So I asked him pointedly who he was instead of what he wanted.

"'Dard, Agent of the Sûreté,' he answered.

"I had to ask him what he wanted, then, you know. His reply to this was curious.

"'In the name of the law I arrest you,' he said.

"'Might I inquire why?' I returned.

"'You, Thompsonne, alias Walkerre,' the little man pursued. 'In short, Thompsonne, with an infinity of aliases. Why, for your last voup at Spa this morning.'

"He was perfectly in earnest, I could see; he meant every word he said. I stared at him. His smile was particularly irritating to me in my then state of mind. The window was open; there was the making of a good fall outside. I admit my first impulse was to dispose of my visitor summarily that way.

"'C'est pas le peine,' he observed, misreading my eyes; 'you would only break your neck.'

"He was so perfectly cool that I had perforce to get myself in hand again.

"'That,' I said to him when I had done it, 'is the second mistake you have made Monsieur—'

"'Dard,' he put in.

"Monsieur Dard, since I have had the pleasure of your society. It was not myself that I was tempted to toss out of that window. And I am not Thompson —"

"English pickpocket," this insufferable Monsieur Dard put in here. "Ah! you are not Thompsonne, English pickpocket? Really?"

"Really not. Your last mistake is rather a ghastly one you will find, I should n't wonder."

"Allons donc!" he responded, shrugging his shoulders.

"My dear Monsieur Dard," I went on, grinning inwardly now, in spite of my annoyance, and in anticipation of Vere's entry on the scene, to see how profoundly convinced my interlocutor was that he had arrested his Thompsonne, and how charmingly he mistook my modest assurance for the impudence of that hardened criminal; "my dear Monsieur Dard, it so happens that in a very few minutes I shall be able to produce unimpeachable evidence of my proper identity."

"Pray do not trouble yourself," he deprecated ironically.

"I am not going to trouble myself at all," I said; "my unimpeachable evidence will walk into this room of its own accord in about a quarter of an hour."

"Aha! And he comes from where, your unimpeachable evidence?"

"From the British Embassy, my dear Monsieur Dard. You will, I presume, admit, then, your mistake is the ghastly mistake I have ventured to style it? You will? Very good. And as you have only a quarter of an hour to wait before you admit this, and as any esclandre would hardly improve matters, do me the favor to sit down, light one of these cigarettes, and relieve my curiosity as to why in your wisdom you have arrested me as Thompson, English pickpocket, and what, supposing I am Thompson aforesaid, I have been doing at Spa?"

"Monsieur Dard looked at me harder, shrugged his shoulders higher, smiled more insufferably than he had looked, and shrugged, and smiled yet. I had, however, so far impressed him in some way, that when I sat down and lit a little roll of Pheresi tobacco he followed my example. Then he said, —

"You were at the Redoute at Spa this morning when play commenced?"

"I admitted I was."

"At the roulette-table in the smaller salle?" he continued.

"Excuse me; you are wrong there. It is well known I never touch roulette. I was at the trente-et-quarante table."

"At the same table," pursued the impassible Dard, "was standing one Hippolyte Bourdon."

"Who is he?"

"Whom you must have noticed place a red portefeuille —"

"A red portefeuille?" I repeated.

"Containing, it appears, in bank-notes, the sum of —"

"Of fifty-odd thousand francs, I suppose," I muttered, pensive at the recollection of my own vanished paper, the result of that run upon the Rouge that morning.

"No," Monsieur Dard returned sharply, "not quite so much as that. About forty thousand francs. A miscount, no doubt," he added.

"By Jove!" I ejaculated in the vernacular, unheeding my friend's sarcasm. "This is queer. A

"Your penetration is perfect," Monsieur Dard replied, with an ironical bow. "A red morocco portefeuille. Monsieur Bordon, as you noticed, placed it in the inner breast-pocket of his coat; and —"

"What! The inner breast-pocket, too?" The coincidence was getting more than queer.

"And you," pursued Monsieur Dard, "took advantage of the crowd at the doorway to —"

"And I will be shot, you know, if Monsieur Dard did n't pantomime precisely the manœuvre my dévaliseur just now must have employed to cut my red morocco portefeuille out of my inner breast-pocket!"

"Go on," I said, astonished. "What did I do then?"

"You rushed precipitately down the staircase of the Redoute."

"I wanted to catch the train, you know."

"Ca se comprend! You jumped into a panier waiting outside, and caused yourself to be driven furiously to the station, where you arrived in time to take a ticket, first-class, to Paris by the 11.37 express."

"I admit all that. Go on."

"In the mean time, though unfortunately too late, Monsieur Bourdon had become aware of his loss. He instantly communicated his suspicions — he had noticed you repeatedly at his elbow — to the Commissaire of Police. Oddly enough," continued Monsieur Dard, his eyes on me more maliciously than ever, the Commissaire was at that moment engaged with the Sergeant Rokerre — you know the Sergeant Rokerre, without doubt? No? Really? Not the Sergeant Rokerre of your own Sûreté from Scotlan'yar? Well, no matter; the Sergeant Rokerre knows you."

"The devil he does!" I interjulated.

"Yes. In fact it was precisely one Thompsonne, with an infinity of aliases, notorious English pickpocket, who had brought the Sergeant Rokerre from Bruxelles, where he had lost sight of his man, to Spa, where he expected to find him; and it was precisely this Thompsonne that Bourdon described when he described the individual he believed had robbed him."

"I don't say he did n't," I commented; "I only say he did n't describe me."

"Wait a minute," Monsieur Dard returned. By means of this description you were traced to the station; by means of it it was ascertained you had taken a ticket for Paris. The Sergeant Rokerre then communicated by telegraph with us, and took other precautions in the event of your changing your mind with regard to your destination. However, these proved unnecessary. You arrived in Paris at nine o'clock this evening. Monsieur Thompsonne is too important a personage for us not to possess his signalement. That telegraphed to us by the Sergeant Rokerre from Spa agreed remarkably with the pen-portrait of the same which I of course consulted when the affair was placed in my hands. So remarkably," concluded Monsieur Dard, "that though the telegrams specified such things as that travelling-dress you wear, as that purple and black plaid, as that peculiarly-fashioned cap, I had need of none of them to feel certain you were the Thompsonne I wanted the instant I came into the room."

"And you feel as certain of it still, Monsieur Dard?"

"Undoubtedly," he said, smiling insufferably few abler agents than this same Dard. I was curious to hear why he was so certain I was his Thompsonne.

"Before I prove to you I am not, prove to me I am," I asked him.

"I will prove that to you in two words," he declared calmly.

"Well."

"He looked me in the eyes with cool triumph in his own, as he leaned across the table and said, —

"The red portefeuille was distinctly seen in your possession at the station là bas at Spa."

"That is very probable," I returned.

"Ah! You admit it? In effect to what good deny it?"

"I don't deny it the least in the world."

"No?" Monsieur Dard replied, rising with that confounded touch of melodrama in his rising that taints all Frenchmen more or less; 'no, you do not deny it, and it would be useless if you did, because that same red portefeuille was again seen in your possession at the station here in Paris three quarters of an hour ago.'

"I admit it was in my possession there too, Monsieur Dard."

"Because," he went on, 'you have held no communication with any one since, except with me; because, therefore, and in short, that red portefeuille and the forty thousand —'

"Excuse me, fifty thousand," I interrupted, spitefully, spoiling his peroration.

"Because," he repeated, 'that red portefeuille is — there!' and he pointed with unhesitating forefinger straight at that inner breast-pocket of my travelling-jacket, where indeed my red morocco note-case ought to have been.

"I could scarcely well help grinning in his sallow, blue-shaven face, at the sell and the swindle that was coming.

"The devil it is!" I replied, turning so as to expose that clean, artistic cut in my garment. 'I should be only too glad if you were right about that, at all events. But what do you make of this, Monsieur Dard?'

"Monsieur Dard did not seem to know exactly what to make of it for a minute or two, I thought. Then he smiled that confounded smile of his, and wagged his head, as it were, admiringly.

"It is very clever," he observed, 'wonderfully clever. But, my dear Monsieur Thompsonne, it will not do. Ah, no; it will not do at all!'

"Eventually I gathered that Monsieur Dard's opinion, belief, conviction, was that I had been operating on myself!"

"And to make one's self out so far from the robber as the robbed would not have been such a bad move on the part of the real Thompson, would it? It was a notion, though, which could only enter that individual's head, — or Monsieur Dard's; so that, to Monsieur Dard, I was simply more positively the real Thompson than ever, don't you see?"

"But that too clever little man's triumph was of the briefest. The next moment the door opened with a rush, and there entered, perhaps more precipitately than he had intended, an unmistakable subordinate from the Rue de Jérusalem, whom I presumed Monsieur Dard had prudently put on guard outside, followed by some one far more reassuring in the shape of Vere Lucingham.

"Some trouble to get at you, Dick," said Vere, when he perceived me. 'Ah! here is Monsieur Dard. Bon jour, Monsieur Dard.'

"Notwithstanding its natural imperturbability, the countenance of the agent of the Sûreté betrayed signs of exquisite discomfort at this salutation; for Monsieur Dard knew who Vere was perfectly well. He had taken certain instructions from the Second Secretary in a matter in which the Embassy had just employed him; and the Second Secretary knew me — Thompsonne, with the infinity of aliases, notorious British pickpocket, and addressed me familiarly as 'Dick.'

"Diable! diable! diable!" muttered discomfited Monsieur Dard in three different keys. If this were the case, why — The inference was as obvious as it was unpleasant. I was no more his Thompsonne than he was himself.

"At a sign the subordinate withdrew. Vere seated himself, and looked from one to the other of us.

"Perhaps I'm de trop?" he inquired, as if this idea had just struck him. 'You've business with Monsieur Dard, Dick?'

"No," I returned, enjoying the spectacle Monsieur Dard presented ineffably; 'it's Monsieur Dard who has business with me. Perhaps you can help him to settle it.'

"All right. What's the row?"

"Monsieur Dard has done me the honor of arresting me," I explained.

"Ah! what for?"

"Picking pockets at Spa."

"Serve you right, you know."

"And as being one Thompsonne, with an infinity of aliases, who picks pockets generally everywhere. Is it not so, Monsieur Dard?"

"Eh, bien, oui!" that individual rapped out; 'for me, I confess, you are Thompsonne. Unless —' And he glanced interrogatively at Vere. Which farceur shook his head dubiously.

"Such," he said, 'is human depravity, that, in spite of his ingenious countenance, it's possible he may be Thompsonne. On the neck of my conscience, Dick, I can't say you're not a swell mobster, and have not been picking pockets at Spa.'

"Allons donc!" muttered Monsieur Dard impatiently.

"But," continued Vere, 'I can say that, except in the legitimate way of whist and billiards, you have never picked mine. And moreover, Monsieur Dard, though you may be right, and society in general wrong, I am bound to add that by society in general, and by myself in particular, this person has hitherto been held to be one Richard Langley, and that, if not honest, he is at least written down honorable in Debrett.'

"Diable! diable! diable!" in the three different keys from Monsieur Dard again at this.

"So that," Vere concluded, 'before altogether renouncing him, perhaps I had better hear all about it.'

"Well, the upshot of it was that we all three beat up the nearest Commissaire; that my identity was duly vouched for, and that it was arranged we should meet the victimized Bourdon, and the English detective Rokerre, before the same official next day, when matters were partially cleared up. Monsieur Bourdon declared that though I very strongly resembled the individual who had stuck to him so pertinaciously at the roulette-table, yet that to the best of his belief he had never set eyes on me before. And the English detective decided as readily that I was not his man."

"Only you see, sir," Sergeant Rokerre explained,

'you really are so uncommon like the other rascal, — that is, I mean, of course, the rascal, — that it ain't no wonder we was put wrong. You had been noticed hurrying off to the station; we thought we was tracking him all the while. Our description of him hit you off so well, that we got that information about your gray jacket, and that queer cap you wore, and so on. Then again the description of you we telegraphed here quite fitted with the one they'd got of him. Altogether, sir, you see it weren't our fault. Besides, you'd been seen with a red pocket-book down at Spa, and you'd been seen with one at the station here. Which that were a odd start, too, you're having your pocket cut that way, weren't it, sir?'

"I had arrived at that opinion already; but as I had had about enough of this 'Comedy of Errors' by this time, I cut Mr. Rokerre's discourse as the 'Chorus' ruthlessly short here."

"Impossible as ever again, Monsieur Dard had played an almost silent part in the last scene. When it was over he saluted us comprehensively, and departed without a word. As his friend and confère Rokerre had remarked, 'all things considered,' the mistake of the French agent was excusable enough. It was nevertheless, though, a mistake, and it punished Monsieur Dard's infallibility sorely to have to own it was."

"But," he said in the course of a brief conversation we had before I left Paris, — 'but, en revanche, I think I can promise you, Monsieur Langley, the recovery of the money you were robbed of on the night of your arrival.'

"You have a clew, then?" I inquired, not over hopefully.

"I have my little theory. If I get carte-blanc to act upon it I will answer for success this time."

"Very good; but remember, Monsieur Dard, I don't know the number of a single note, to begin with."

"That is of no consequence, — you can identify the portefeuille?"

"Of course."

"Well, it is part of my theory that the money is in that portefeuille still, exactly as it was when it was stolen."

"The only thing, then, is to discover the portefeuille, Monsieur Dard?" I laughed.

"Precisely," he responded. "If, as I say, I am allowed to act, I consider that discovery certain. It shall be my amende honorable."

"With that Monsieur Dard took his leave. I can't say that he left me with any very abiding hope of getting my note-case again. It was, nevertheless, destined to become 'an affair' not yet forgotten at the Préfecture."

"On the Boulevard, three months later, I ran against Vere one afternoon."

"Well, my Thompsonne," said the farceur, 'and how is business, eh? Faked any more fat note-cases lately? I suppose so, for your old friend Dard was inquiring for you just now.'

"What did he want me for?"

"I could n't gather the precise crime you'd been perpetrating; but he asked so suspiciously when you'd be back that I thought it more leasy to answer him vocally out of "Kathleen Mavourneen" —

"It might n't be for years, and it might n't be forever," at which he seemed annoyed. So at last I proposed for a certain sum down to betray you unto him to-night.'

"Don't be a d— fool! What do you mean?"

"I mean that I'm going to order a mirobolant dinner in here, and that you are to pay for it like a bird. At least, I shall think but poorly of you if you don't, when I have told you that — keep cool now — that our Dard has recovered the coin you boned from, — I mean the coin that was boned from you, you know."

"Bah!"

"And that your formal identification of your purloined note-case is all that is wanting to put you once more in possession of your ill-gotten gains, when, as a matter of course, you will invite us all to a dancing-supper at Brébant's."

"I may as well add at once that I was eventually let in for this entertainment, and then leave Monsieur Dard to finish the 'Affair of the Red Portefeuille' in his own fashion without further interruption."

"My theory," he said, 'was this: Monsieur Langley, not being my Thompsonne, had neither robbed Bourdon nor — as I had given him great credit for doing — himself; but, on the contrary, Monsieur Langley had indubitably been robbed by some one else. Now was it not a thing unnatural, almost impossible, to suppose that on the same day, in precisely the same way as he was being accused of having robbed Bourdon at Spa, Monsieur Langley should be robbed at the Place Roubaix of a similar portefeuille, containing a similarly large amount, by any mere casual cut-purse? To me it seemed so impossible that I rejected the supposition at once. I had, therefore, to conclude that it was no mere casual cut-purse who had robbed Monsieur Langley."

"Who then? Some one who had planned the coup at Spa, and followed the red portefeuille in Monsieur Langley's inner breast-pocket to Paris?"

"Much more likely. And yet the chance of success was hardly great enough in proportion to the inevitable risk, to tempt an artist of such force as Monsieur Langley's dévaliseur evidently was, to leave securer and more profitable business là bas. It is true my Thompsonne, who had imperative reasons for quitting Spa, might have taken this purse also on his way; but I had ascertained that my Thompsonne had not arrived in Paris at all, you see."

"I put this second supposition aside the more readily because of something I remembered suddenly."

"I remembered that that evening there had been at the Paris terminus, waiting the arrival of the express at nine o'clock, a man who, the moment he beheld Monsieur Langley, would be morally certain that in a certain pocket of Monsieur Langley's travelling-coat was a red portefeuille containing some forty thousand francs in bank-notes, who would have special reasons for watching Monsieur Langley closer than anybody else, and who believed Monsieur Langley to be Thompsonne the pickpocket."

"Remembering this, I quickly saw how this man, with special reasons for watching Monsieur Langley closely, might have noticed him take the portefeuille from his pocket, to get out his keys say; how this man, who believed Monsieur Langley to be Monsieur Thompsonne, might have hardly calculated on being able to rob him with perfect impunity, inasmuch as, on the one hand, even if Thompsonne caught him in flagrante delicto, a word from one thief would make the other only too glad to hold his tongue! and, on the other hand, if Thompsonne were not to perceive his loss at the moment, he was to be arrested, so soon as he was domiciled, by me, when, his dévaliseur naturally supposed, there was slight chance of my prisoner proclaiming he had been robbed of the most positive proofs of his late operation at Spa.

"In short, I saw in a very brief while how this man might have robbed Monsieur Langley, supposing him to be Thompsonne. The more I reflected on the matter the more certain did I become that this man, and no other, was the actual robber.

"And he was, — the agent who had been ordered to "filer" the supposed Thompsonne on his arrival. The "faiseur" of the red portefeuille was this particular agent, I was finally convinced, and no one else.

"The conclusion I had arrived at was a very grave one. We are, we must be, invariably above suspicion in our métier. But I had arrived at this conclusion deliberately, and I could arrive at this alone. I laid my theory, therefore, before the Chef, and more effectively than I had ventured to hope. After some deliberation the Chef decided that, considering the importance of this matter to ourselves, I should be allowed to clear it up if I could. At the same time the consequences of my failing to do so were plainly intimated to me. But I did not think I should fail. Armed with the Chef's carte-blanc I lost no time in placing my "suspect" under surveillance forthwith.

"His name was Falleix. Certain protection had procured him admittance into the Brigade, where we knew unusually little of his antecedents; a fact which had no doubt had its influence in deciding the Chef in favor of an investigation.

"In my unavoidable absence, at the last moment, Falleix, to whom all the details of the affair must have been well known, was directed to await the arrival of the supposed Thompsonne by the express at nine o'clock, and in the event of my still not having appeared, to filer that individual quietly wherever he might go, — our object being to make the acquaintance of any confederates Thompsonne might have in Paris, you understand. I reached the Gare just as Monsieur Langley was driving away to the Grand Hôtel. Once there, I, as you will doubtless recollect, left Falleix outside the supposed Thompsonne's room, entered it myself, and arrested Monsieur Langley, — a deplorable error, for which I have only forgiven myself since yesterday.

"Convinced by Monsieur Lucingham shortly afterwards of this error, you will also recollect I signed to my aide that he might withdraw. Which he did in the most tranquil manner possible, carrying off the red portefeuille and the fifty thousand francs of Monsieur Langley with him. When, next day, I informed him of the fiasco, and the way in which our supposed faiseur had himself been robbed, it pleased Monsieur Falleix to lift his shoulders in his customary silent fashion, and to smile disagreeably in my face. I remembered that smile when the notion that Monsieur Falleix, and none but he, was the robber, began to grow upon me. He had had time to dispose of his plunder, and had evidently so disposed of it as to feel quite safe.

"How? Where? Questions I had to answer, and questions very difficult to answer; for the way in which he had planned and performed this coup proved Monsieur Falleix at once to be a person of profound ability, who would never have forgotten to take into his calculations the possibility, at any rate, of his being suspected and watched as I meant he should be.

"No; Monsieur Langley's red portefeuille, — I was of opinion, by the by, that the portefeuille itself had not been destroyed, either because Falleix would consider its destruction immaterial when it was no longer liable to be found in his possession, or because he had had no means of destroying it safely forthwith, and had been too prudent to keep it about him till he should have had these means, — Monsieur Langley's portefeuille, I say, and its contents, the proof of Falleix's guilt and the correctness of my theory, were only to be discovered through Falleix's impatience or imprudence. Only this could give me a clew; and this clew my "suspect," who now began to live, as it were, under glass, — the minutest action, the most trifling incidents of whose life were all henceforth known to me, seemed to have determined I should wait for eternally. The closest watch upon him brought to light — absolutely nothing. My "suspect" continued to conduct himself in the most unsuspicious manner possible. This I had anticipated; he had taken it for granted he was surveillé, of course. But the Chef grew, or appeared to grow, incredulous. I was pushing my theory too far, he said; it was indigne, this que diable!

"Was it? Was I mistaken? I did not wonder they thought I was; but I never thought so, somehow, myself. No; Falleix was even stronger than I had imagined; that was all.

"He was poor, miserably poor, amongst us who are not rich. Miserably poor. Yet I could see on his debauchee's face signs of the vices that are costly. Those fifty thousand francs, — how could he resist the temptation of them? How could he hold himself back from them any longer? Yet I knew he had not spent a sou; yet I doubted if he had even once allowed himself to ascertain if his treasure was still safe. Marvellous self-denial! What was he waiting for? A pretext to get quit of us, and beyond our reach. Never beyond mine, I used sometimes to say to myself, if he went to the end of the world.

"I think he knew this. I think he must have known the incessant, terrible espionnage he was subjected to. But he bore it, and so he baffled it; his patience was proof against it, and he made no sign.

"There are those who declared at last that he was innocent. Three months had passed; this was the sole result I had obtained. But my conviction of his guilt was strong as ever.

"However, there must be an end of this, the Chef declared. Falleix must be released from surveillance. As for me, I thought it advisable to anticipate events by tendering my resignation at once.

"The Chef smiled and shook his head.

"Not yet," he said.

"But since it appears that I am wrong?"

"Not yet, I tell you. Ah! ça, you do not then understand me?"

"At last I did. The Chef's idea was simple enough. "Falleix," he reasoned, "has been perfectly aware of the watch we have kept upon him, and so has taken very good care to avoid betraying himself. When he finds he is no longer filé, he will conclude he is no longer suspected. And then, — well, then, you see, he may be less careful. So I withdraw a useless surveillance, and — I leave the rest to you."

"The next day it was reported at the Préfecture that I had been sent on special service across the Channel. But that day, and every day, in one disguise or another, I dogged my man about Paris, patiently, ruthlessly, as a hound follows a trail. In vain, however; in vain always.

"Had he recognized me? I felt sure he had not. Was he really guilty after all? Yes; a thousand times yes. My instinct if not my judgment told me I had not deceived myself. I stuck doggedly to the trail. Admit, though, Messieurs, that this affair was assuming a hopeless aspect. There appeared no limit to the time this game of hide-and-seek between us might last.

"I was thinking so two mornings ago when, once more, my man-chase recommenced. In his usual listless fashion Falleix was strolling along the Quais just sufficiently ahead to be kept well in sight. It seemed everybody's Dimanche but his; in his threadbare garments he looked more miserably poverty-stricken than ever then. Surely, he must allow himself to draw on the red portefeuille soon I tried to hope.

"All at once his listless mode of progression changed. My flâneur began walking like a man with some object in view. I had to shorten the distance between us.

"Across the Place, across the Boulevard, where was he going so straight? To the station in the Rue d'Amsterdam it appeared presently. Tempted by the sunshine, the poor devil wanted to breathe a little country air. Where?

"He waited his turn at the bureau of the St. Germain line. His destination, I concluded, then, was Asnières. The price of a seat on the impériale to that favored locality would hardly be beyond his means. But no. He was going farther, — too far, it struck me. He must have been difficile about the country air he breathed, for he asked for a ticket for Chatou.

"Diable! Why Chatou, when we were so poor that positively our whole available capital could not compass the fare; and but for the compassionate official who consented to accept a little bon upon the Préfecture in payment we could never have gone at all? Why Chatou?

"I tried to solve this question on our way down; for, I need hardly tell you, I also had business at Chatou that day.

"Arrived there, Falleix strolled away, listless as ever, from the station, I following. I suppose we had about equally enjoyed the country air for half an hour, when the delusive sunshine faded; it began to rain, — to rain in torrents. Impossible to continue strolling about in this deluge. We took shelter in a certain restaurant.

"Positively ce malheureux had no chance. His little holiday was spoiled. Hour after hour passed by; the deluge only increased; he had only to stare blankly at the downpour. He manifested a melancholy resignation, — so touching that I caught myself almost pitying him at times.

"Towards dusk, when nothing remained for him but to go home, the rain suddenly ceased. He took immediate advantage of the opportunity of reaching the station with a dry skin. I felt half inclined to let him go in peace. What could I learn by simply dogging him back again?

"Yet why had he come here at all? Why here to Chatou in particular? In a moment I had started after him, as this question recurred to me.

"He must have walked fast; he was out of sight. No; I caught a glimpse of him as he turned swiftly off the roadway into the wood. Why, if he were so pressed, that détour through the wood?

"I reached the place where he had disappeared. Screened securely by the bushes, I looked for him. There he was, walking now as though he had just discovered he had plenty of time to reach the station before the coming train.

"Had he suspected me? Or had the momentary chance I had stupidly afforded him enabled him to do what he had come here to do? Had those two or three minutes lost me the whole game? I strained my eyes in the gathering darkness to see.

"And, suddenly, I saw him swing round, and glance sharply about him. And then he seemed to lean against the trunk of a tree beside him while one might count slowly five. And then he lounged on, this flâneur, never looking back. I let him go, now. I waited still where I was till I had heard the train pass, and stop, and start.

"Then in my turn I walked down that pathway, and halted by that tree, and perceived its trunk was hollow. In that hollow, my instinct told me, lay the proof of my little theory. Yet I paused a few seconds before I put in my hand.

"My hand pushed aside the dead leaves and the moss and touched it, and drew it forth, — a small tin box. In this tin box was the red morocco portefeuille of Monsieur Langley, bearing his initials. In the red portefeuille were fifty-one thousand two hundred francs in bank-notes of the Bank of France.

"For more than three months that tin box had lain where I found it; for more than three months my Falleix had baffled us all. But the temptation to assure himself of the safety of his butin had in the end proved too strong even for prudence like his. He had come down that day to touch it, — only to touch it while one might have counted slowly five.

"Unfortunately for him it was I who counted.

"I put the notes back into the portefeuille, the portefeuille into the tin box, and the tin box into the hollow trunk again. That night I made my report to the Chef. Yesterday Falleix was brought down to Chatou, and I reproduced tin box, portefeuille, bank-notes, to everybody's satisfaction but his.

"Poor devil! He fainted.

"And that is the end of the Affair of the Red Portefeuille. I trust Monsieur Langley will consider I have made him the amende honorable I promised him?

"Well, you know," Dick concluded, "it was n't for me to say he had n't!"

THE LEGEND OF DUNBLANE.

IN TWO CHAPTERS. CHAPTER II.

I slept soundly during the first part of the night. But about three o'clock I woke suddenly, — I might almost say, I started from my sleep. I had not been dreaming; I was not conscious of having heard any noise; but my sleep, somehow or other was broken suddenly, and I sat up in my bed with a sense of undefined alarm. I listened: all was still: the sighing of the wind among the Scotch firs below the rampart-wall was the only thing I heard. But, feeling restless, I jumped out of bed, went to the window and opened it. There was no moon, but it was a light night. I could distinguish the ivy on the wall beneath; the little door in the angle of the turret opposite, and the dusky forms of the owls that flew past the window. Almost immediately beneath it was a curious old well said to be of wonderful depth, but long since unused. If one dropped a stone in there, an interval which seemed like half a minute elapsed before a faint splash told that it had reached the bottom.

I had been at the window a few minutes when the door in the turret opposite opened, with a slight grating sound which attracted my attention. A figure glided forth, and ran swiftly towards the well. I distinguished that it was a woman by the long drapery, and as she came under the window I could just make out that she carried some sort of vessel in her hand. Whatever it was she threw it in, and waited, leaning over the side, until she caught the distant thud of the object as it met the water. Then she returned rather more leisurely than she had come, the door was shut, and, though I waited at the window a full hour, I saw and heard no more.

I do not know that at any other place, at any other time, this circumstance would have aroused my curiosity. As it was, I could not get to sleep again for thinking of it, and speculating what could have been the motive that induced any female of the establishment to rise in the dead of night in order to cast something into the well.

I had to be stirring very early, and I was at my solitary breakfast when Lord Dunblane entered. He looked ghastly, so much so that I could not help asking if he was ill. He turned fiercely round upon me, demanding why I asked.

"Because you look as if you had not slept," I said.

"And you? Pray how did you sleep?" he inquired, knitting his brows. "You were not disturbed? You had no nightmare after Lady Dunblane's conversation last night?"

I had resolved to say nothing of what I had seen, and replied that I had rested pretty well. I was then proceeding to express my thanks to him for his hospitality when he interrupted me. "If you wish to show yourself a friend, say as little as possible about your visit here to any one. I am going abroad at once. I have made up my mind that Lady Dunblane can live here no longer.

"You have heard enough to know how she hates the place,—and it disagrees with her, moreover. She has had several epileptic attacks,—a severe one this very night; it is evident that the climate does not suit her, and I am recommended to take her to Italy. My lady and I can never agree here. She does all she can to goad me to madness,—and perhaps she has succeeded: who can say? People will gossip, Carthews, when we are gone. Prove yourself a friend, and say nothing about our quarrels while you have been here."

I was a good deal surprised at the tenor of this speech, but thought it reasonable upon the whole. There was something in his eye, nevertheless, which disquieted me. Coupling it with Pilson's words, two days previously, and with my own observations, I could not avoid the conviction that the fate to which he himself had just now alluded was imminent. It might be warded off, perhaps, by change of scene, and the removal of the causes of irritation; but it was impossible to look at him steadily, and to doubt that incipient insanity was there. I begged him to act upon his determination of going abroad without loss of time; and then, shaking his hand, I stepped into the chaise, and drove off.

Well, I returned to Aberdeen; and some days after this Pilson called on me. I asked what news he brought of Lord and Lady Dunblane.

"They are gone abroad. I suppose it is the best thing he could do. Her ladyship had a succession of such severe fits that she was unable to leave her room, or to see any one but her maid after you left. I did see her once at the window, and her look quite alarmed me. His lordship was much calmer, but he scarcely spoke. His wife's sudden prostration, after all their violent bickerings, affected him a good deal. He is in a bad way, I think, Carthews. I mean that I am very much afraid"—and he pointed significantly to his head.

I told him that I fully shared his apprehensions, and then asked him more particularly to describe the change in Lady Dunblane's appearance.

"The morning I left I was walking round the rampart when I heard one of the windows rattle. I looked up, and there was Lady Dunblane, her head pressed against the panes, and with such a terrible expression of agony in her face as I shall never forget. She kept opening her mouth, and making the most hideous grimaces at me, so that it was clear that she was not quite in her right senses at the moment. She disappeared suddenly."

"Did you ever see any indication of a tendency to such a malady in her ladyship?" I asked.

"No. I cannot say I ever did," he replied.

"Was no doctor sent for?"

"Yes, the country apothecary came once."

"And what did he say? Did you speak to him?"

"Yes. I saw him in the hall as he was stepping into his buggy. I asked how he found her ladyship. He said she was much prostrated by the violence of the attack, but he seemed a puzzle-headed fellow. No doubt he was awed by the honor of being sent for to the castle; for I could not get much out of him. He seemed dazed; but muttered something about change being good for her ladyship."

"And who attended her during these attacks?" I inquired.

"No one but his lordship and the maid Elspie. My lord told me that his wife was very violent; but he would not suffer any of the men to be sent for, to hold her. He and Elspie, who is a very powerful woman, managed her between them. He said that he had found it necessary to tie her hands. I do not envy him his journey. They left in the family coach an hour after our departure, and were to travel night and day to Leith, where they took ship for Holland.

He then went on to say that the young heir-at-law had returned to London much depressed with his visit, and that the necessary formalities having now been gone through (which I understand to mean that the secret of the haunted room had been duly communicated to him), Mr. Dunblane would in all probability never see the castle again during my lord's lifetime.

I seldom saw Pilson for some time after this conversation; when I did, he told me what little he knew of the Dunblanes; but months often elapsed without his having any direct communication with my lord, and even then the letters he received were mere bald statements and inquiries, exclusively upon matters of business. These, however, were sufficient to show that his mind had not given way; they were lucid and perspicuous in every detail. There was never any mention of her lady-ship, for the obvious reason, as it transpired after a while, that she and my lord were separated.

He was travelling in Italy, now in Hungary, now in the East, while she remained, — no one knew exactly where, — in Switzerland. At the end of the third year he returned to Dunblane, and shut himself up there, refusing to see any of the neighbors who called. In reply to every inquiry for her ladyship (more especially those which a distant cousin, her only relation, made about this time), he stated that her ladyship's health obliged her to remain on the Continent; her mind had been much weakened by continued epileptic attacks, and she was unequal to correspondence. He stated, further, that she was under excellent medical care, and that though by reason of the excitement under which she sometimes labored, it was not deemed advisable that he should visit her often, he made a point of doing so once a year. This statement seems to have been considered satisfactory. Lady Dunblane's friends — and she had very few — were not suspicious, and the world at large troubled itself but little with the domestic concerns of a couple who had lived in isolated grandeur with rare exceptions, since his lordship's accession to the title. Pilson went twice to the castle, during that year, and, as far as I know, he was the only guest. He gave a gloomy picture of the solitary man shut up in that big place. We both avoided all mention of her ladyship's name; but I now know that he was no easier than I was on that head.

It was towards the close of 1808 that he called on me one morning, at an unusually early hour. His face, his whole manner, betokened that my grave, quiet friend was unusually perturbed. He looked round the room, — this very room where we are sitting, — drew his chair close to mine, and said in a whisper: —

"Carthews, I have come to you in a very distressing emergency. I hardly know whether I am justified in taking this step, but I do know that I can depend on you, and you may materially help me in a most painful and difficult situation."

Without more ado, he then proceeded to say that a young Frenchman, who gave his name as Jean Marcel, had called upon him the previous night, stating that he had lately come from Geneva, where he was in a wine merchant's office, and had been sent on business to Aberdeen. He was the bearer of a small crumpled note addressed in nearly illegible characters, to M. Pilson, Attorney, Aberdeen. He stated that he had come by it thus.

Shortly before leaving Geneva, it had been his duty to inspect the "recolte" of various vineyards: among them one belonging to the Château d'Osman some miles distant. The house itself was tenanted by an English lady, who was said to be mad or imbecile. At all events she was never heard to speak, and was closely watched by her attendants night and day. She walked on a terrace overlooking the vineyard, but it was never out of sight of a gaunt woman, who was, no doubt, her keeper. The intendant of the estate, who told Jean Marcel these particulars, walked through the vineyard with him, when they saw the unhappy lady on the terrace above. Her appearance had much interested Marcel. He described her as a handsome woman, but with a fixed woe-begone expression of face, and wearing a black cloak, which entirely concealed her person. In the course of Marcel's inspection, they stood for some time just under the terrace wall, and he spoke to the intendant of his approaching voyage to Aberdeen. There was no doubt but that he was overheard by the lady on the terrace. She disappeared, but a quarter of an hour later, while they were still near the wall, the two men heard the sound of a running footstep upon the terrace, followed by a plaintive moaning, like that of a wounded bird. They looked up, and there she stood, glancing round with an expression of terror to see if she was followed, and of earnest supplication toward the two men beneath. She opened her mouth wide, — a clear proof, the intendant seemed to think, of the poor creature's imbecility, — then raised both arms up high, when, to his horror, he perceived that she had lost her right hand. With her left, she then suddenly dropped over the wall a paper with a stone inside, and had scarcely done this, when her gaunt attendant appeared upon the terrace. The poor lady's whole demeanor changed; the old fixed look returned, and she began once more, with slow, uncertain steps, to pace the terrace. To gratify her, Marcel picked up the paper, and pocketed it, as he walked away. As soon as he was out of sight he examined it.

Outside was scrawled, "Pour l'amour de Dieu remettez cette lettre à son adresse." Within was the note addressed to Pilson. The intendant laughed at the affair, and tried to persuade Marcel to tear up the note. "All mad people imagine themselves to be sane, and this one no doubt wants to persuade her friends that she is unjustly confined; but you need only look at her to see that she is a lunatic."

Marcel admitted the probability of this, but he could not bring himself to destroy the paper. Whether she was mad or not, the condition of this maimed unhappy creature had aroused his compassion so deeply, that he declared the first thing he would do on arriving at Aberdeen would be to find out the person to whom this note was addressed. And he had done so.

When he had finished this strange narrative, Pilson laid before me a scrap of paper, — evidently the blank page torn out of the end of a book — on which was scrawled: —

"Help! for God's sake, help! before they kill me. O save me, Mr. Pilson, save me, as you hope to be saved hereafter."

E. DUNBLANE."

We looked at each other for some minutes without speaking. At last Pilson said, —

"If I consulted my own interest, I should remain silent, or simply enclose these lines to his lordship. Her ladyship's condition, no doubt, justifies any steps that have been taken. I cannot suspect my lord; and if he discovers that I have interfered in his domestic concerns, he will certainly take the management of his affairs out of my hands. But, on the other hand, does not humanity call for some investigation into this? I could not die at peace, remembering that I had turned a deaf ear to such a cry; but I am puzzled what to do, Mr. Carthews. It has occurred to me that you may have business connections with Geneva, and might, perhaps, make inquiries which would not compromise you as they would me."

In other words, Pilson was anxious to ease his conscience at as little risk to himself as might be. I did not blame him; my interest was too deeply stirred for me not to follow up the inquiry with the keenest avidity. But then, as Pilson had hinted, it is true that I had nothing to lose. I promised him that I would write that very day to a correspondent at Geneva, and desire him to leave no stone unturned towards discovering the truth.

I had to wait some weeks for the answer. The commission was one the execution of which was beset with difficulties. The village pasteur, the doctor, the intendant of the vineyards, and all the neighbors were applied to, but little additional information could be gathered. At last the maire of the district was induced to investigate the case, upon representations being made to him that there existed suspicions as to the treatment which the incarcerated lady — whether insane or only imbecile — met with. After a vigorous resistance they forced an entry into the château. The sight that met them was heart-rending. The poor creature lay dying upon her bed, and but for this intervention would have been denied the last consolations of religion. When the pasteur knelt down, however, and questioned her, she only shook her head and moaned. Then, with an effort, she opened her mouth wide, and, to their horror, they perceived that she had no tongue.

They implored her to write down the name of the perpetrator of this barbarous crime. But either she had no strength, or else she was praying, poor soul, for grace to forgive her persecutors, rather than for retribution. She listened devoutly to the good pasteur's prayers, and a glorious smile lighted up her tear-worn eyes as the death-film gathered over them. So the unhappy lady passed away. The woman Elspie was, of course, seized, and subjected to a rigorous cross-examination. She declared that the lady who was just dead had been thus mutilated by her husband one night when goaded into a state of insane rage by his wife's discovery of a secret, to which he attached a superstitious importance, and which she threatened to proclaim to all the world. In the struggle to defend herself, her right wrist was also severed. The woman maintained that her mistress had ever since been subject to violent fits of delirium, necessitating restraint. This I do not believe; there is no proof of it whatever. How far the rest of her story was true, it was impossible to say, and will never now be known. There were probabilities in favor of it; but, on the other hand, might not this wretch herself have been the instrument? I did not forget that I had seen her (as I have now no sort of doubt) on that fatal night stealing out to throw something into the well. Of her complicity, at all events, there was ample proof, since from the first she was the attendant upon her ill-fated mistress. But the hand of justice, for all that, was stayed.

The very same day that I received the letter containing the foregoing particulars, and while Pilson and I were deliberating what steps must now be taken, the news of an appalling catastrophe, which had happened thirty-six hours previously, reached us.

Lord Dunblane had been burnt in his bed, and the greater part of the castle destroyed. How the fire originated was never known, but it broke out from his lordship's room in the dead of night, and three sides of the quadrangle were burnt to the ground before the flames could be got under. The lovers of coincidences tried afterwards to make out that Lord Dunblane and his wife died the same night; the superstitious even fabricated a theory that, struck with remorse, upon learning, by second sight, of his wife's death, he had himself fired the castle, and resolutely perished in the flames. But all this is purely imaginary. It is sufficiently remarkable that these deaths should have been so near one another; but Lady Dunblane died at least five days before her husband; and as to the supposition of his lordship's self-destruction, the only ground for it was his strange mental condition, which was no worse than it had been for the last four years.

The woman Elspie was set at large by the authorities at Geneva, no one coming forward as her accuser. Mr. Pilson thought, and I believe he was right, that now both Lord and Lady Dunblane were dead it was better this terrible story should not be made public. It oozed out, in the course of time, as almost all such scandals do, but not through me. It was only when I found that all sorts of false or garbled versions of the circumstances were current in society that I ever mentioned what I knew, and that was years afterwards, when, in default of heirs, the title of Dunblane had become extinct.

THE QUEER CUSTOMER.

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

In a shabby little shop in a shabby little street, a man sat stitching away as if for dear life, by the light of a single candle. The name of John Todd was over the door, and John Todd himself it was who sat upon the shopboard, keeping time to his nimble needle with an occasional snatch of a song. If there had been a song of the trousers, as well as of the shirt, he might with great propriety have sung that, for it was on a pair of those garments that he was employed. As it was, however, he did not confine himself to any one particular melody, but sang a verse of one and then a verse of another, as the fancy took him. Immediately above him hung a disreputable-looking old blackbird in a wicker cage who listened to the performance with an air of grave attention, as one who was qualified to be critical, and occasionally gave an encouraging chirp of applause. The singer was a merry little man, no longer young, but still lithe and active; with twinkling gray eyes and a cheery smile which it was pleasant to look upon.

On the present occasion he had just got through "Jock o' Hazeldean," and the "Banks of Allan Water" (which the blackbird applauded immensely), and had begun "Mary of Argyre," when the shop door suddenly opened, and pulled him up short in the very middle of a very effective shake. The person who entered was a short, stout individual, with his hat very far back on his head, a pen behind his ear, and a parchment-covered note-book in his hand.

"Well, Mr. Todd," said he, showing the while the end of a stumpy pencil; "ready for me I suppose."

The little tailor's cheerful countenance fell, as he replied —

"I'm very sorry, Mr. Sprague, but I'm — the fact is — I can't say I am quite ready to-night."

"Then, why the dooce ain't you ready?" amiably inquired Mr. Sprague, tapping the floor viciously with his fat cotton umbrella. "You're aweeer, I suppose, that to-morrow's Christmas-day; and you're also aweeer that to avoid unpleasantness at a gay and festive season, I collect the rent the night before. Then why ain't you ready?"

"To tell you the truth, sir," said John humbly, "I've had a disappointment this morning — a little account I was to receive —"

"Yah!" said Mr. Sprague savagely. "That makes five on 'em, all been disappointed of a little account. Gammon! Now look here, Mr. Todd. This is Toosday. I'm a man of my word, and if the rent ain't ready Thursday, brokers is the word. I've had trouble enough with you, and I ain't goin' to, no longer. So now you've got it."

"I'll do my endeavors, Mr. Sprague," said John Todd humbly. "But which way I am to turn to find the money, the Lord only knows!"

"You'll turn ow, Mr. Todd, if you don't find it." And with a coarse laugh at his own wit, Mr. Sprague departed.

Poor Todd looked much depressed. After a few minutes he unconsciously commenced "The harp that once through Tara's halls," but the attempt was a failure. Even the blackbird turned his back in disgust, and after a few bars John gave it up, and stitched away in sorrowful silence. He might have remained so for perhaps half an hour, when the door again opened, and a little old lady in a black bonnet and cloak, and a basket on her arm, and a muff nearly as large as herself, peeped in.

"Do I intrude, Mr. Todd? Ah! quite by yourself. Dear me!"

"Yes, Miss Pinnifer, for want of better company, — quite by myself."

"Ye-es!" said Miss Pinnifer. "And very busy I see. Always busy! — Coat, I presume?"

"No, ma'am, trousers," said John Todd.

"Oh!" said Miss Pinnifer, with a little scream, and covering her eyes with her hand. "Very indiscreet of me, — I beg pardon, I'm sure."

"Don't mention it, ma'am!" replied John gallantly. "It's of no consequence. Yes, I am rather busy, Miss Pinnifer. They're for a Mr. Brown, — an old gentleman who came in last Thursday. He ordered a suit of blacks, and said he'd fetch 'em himself this evening, and I'm a little behind, you see."

"Ye-es!" Miss Pinnifer had a habit of saying "Yes," when spoken to, irrespective of anything in particular. She used the word to indicate various shades of feeling; but in a general way it was expressive of a mild surprise and admiration which encouraged the speaker to proceed. Mr. Todd proceeded accordingly.

"I hope he won't come just yet, for I've got nigh on two hours' work to finish the job. He's a queer customer, very. Never saw him before in my life, and he comes and sits down in that very chair, and talks and asks questions as if he had known me ever since I was so high? All about the children and Milly and everybody —"

"Strange!" said Miss Pinnifer. "Can it be? Yes, that must be it!"

"Eh?" said Mr. Todd, inquiringly.

"Now, mark me!" said Miss Pinnifer, laying a rather bony finger impressively upon the queer customer's trousers. Mr. Todd marked her accordingly. "Did he ask anything about me?"

"I don't remember that he did," replied Mr. Todd.

"I dare say not. Indeed, that rather confirms my previous idea. I know their ways, Mr. Todd."

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," said John, in much bewilderment. "Whose ways might you be alluding to?"

"Hush!" said Miss Pinnifer, with an air of profound mystery. "You don't know who may be listening to us at this moment, — detectives!"

"You don't think, ma'am —"

"Yes, I do; I do, indeed, Mr. Todd. I have n't the smallest doubt that I am at this moment the object of a private inquiry. You must know, Mr.

Todd, though I don't often mention it, that I'm engaged in a Chancery suit, and the defendants are horribly wicked people. They've done it before, I know they have. Not content with keeping my poor brother and myself out of our property, they have us watched and annoyed in every possible way. You'd hardly imagine the number of lodgings we've been to, Mr. Todd, and the people were always so polite and friendly at first, and after a few weeks they quite changed, and were quite rude and unpleasant. They'd been set against us by the detectives, you know. It was all very well to say it was the two or three weeks' rent we might be owing, but I knew better than that. And now they've traced me here. Dear, dear, what shall I do?"

"But are you quite sure —"

"O dear, yes, certain. It's been going on for a long time. There was a pale young man in spectacles stared at me all church time last Sunday. I thought at the time it was only rudeness, but no doubt he had his instructions."

At this moment the conversation was interrupted by the arrival of the queer customer himself. He was an elderly gentleman with a rubicund complexion, and a very good-natured expression of countenance, and certainly did not look like a detective. As he entered the shop, Miss Pinnifer dropped her veil, and drawing herself up to her full height of four feet six, faced the intruder with excessive dignity. The stranger politely raised his hat to the lady, and then turned to John Todd.

"Well, Mr. Todd, and how do you do to-night? Am I too early for my little matter of business?"

"Well, sir!" said Mr. Todd, "I won't say but what I'd rather you'd have come an hour later. The coat and waistcoat have been done some time, but the trousers — (Mr. Todd remembered the modest presence of Miss Pinnifer) — the other garments are not quite finished."

"Never mind, Mr. Todd, it's of no great consequence. I'm in no especial hurry. But I'm going to ask you a favor. I shall surprise you now, I dare say."

Poor Todd was so bewildered by the remarkable communication just made to him by Miss Pinnifer, coupled with the singular present appearance of that lady (she was standing with one foot advanced, her eye steadily fixed on the stranger, and held her muff across her chest, in a kind of boxing attitude), that he knew not what to answer, and could only reply confusedly.

"Don't mention it."

The stranger, answering rather the spirit than the letter of his words, continued, —

"To-morrow's Christmas-day. For twenty years past I've been a wanderer on the face of the earth, and this is the first Christmas-day, during all that time, I've spent in England. I've no friends, not so much as a dog or a cat, and I don't like the idea of spending Christmas by myself. Will you take compassion on me, Mr. Todd? You've a Christmas face, and I've a notion I could enjoy Christmas very well in your company. Will you take compassion on a lonely old man, and let him spend to-morrow with you and your family?"

John Todd was in much perplexity. His warm heart felt for the lonely stranger, by whose frank address he was much prepossessed. On the other hand, there was Miss Pinnifer's statement, and John could not quite get rid of a vague apprehension that the stranger might, if admitted, take advantage of an unguarded moment to handcuff the family all round, and bear them away to perpetual imprisonment; last but not least, was the consideration that the larder was by no means sumptuously furnished, and that the Christmas fare was likely to be of an especially meagre description. The last reflection dictated his reply.

"If you're really in earnest, sir, it 'ud be unbecoming in me to say no, when you do me the honor to ask it. But we poor folks don't live like the gentry, you know, sir, at the best of times; and this year we've got even shorter commons than usual. We've hearty good-fellowship, sir, but very little else, to keep Christmas with."

"And hearty good-fellowship is the very best dish at the Christmas feast," said the stranger. "Beef and pudding are not to be despised, but they're only secondary, after all. Well, you have n't said 'no,' so I shall consider myself accepted. I've dined off a baked potato before now, and I shall find enough to eat, never you fear. What's your time? One o'clock — very good."

"This lady and her brother reside in the house, sir, and they were going to club their Christmas dinner with ours, if you have no objection."

"Objection! I, my dear Todd! you forget that I'm only a visitor. Objection! certainly not. The more the merrier, I say. Madam, your most obedient."

Miss Pinnifer relaxed so far as to courtesy with dignity, still, however, keeping her muff available for defence, if necessary.

"Well, that's settled," said the stranger. "And now I've got some little matters of business to attend to, so I'll wish you a good night. Good evening, madam. Don't distress yourself about the trousers, Mr. Todd."

With these words the unknown departed, leaving Mr. Todd and Miss Pinnifer dumb with amazement. The latter recovered her speech first, with the observation, "Did you ever?" Mr. Todd looked at her for a few moments. At last he ejaculated, slowly and distinctly, "No, I never!"

"What a very singular person, Mr. Todd! You're quite sure you've never seen him before?"

"Never to my knowledge till the other night," said Mr. Todd.

"There's more in this than meets the eye," said Miss Pinnifer.

"You still think, ma'am —"

"Well, no, not entirely. I must say I expected to see quite a different style of person. But there's no knowing. I shall be on my guard."

"If he is n't a detective, what can he want to come here for?" said Mr. Todd. "It's the most extraordinary thing I ever heard in my life. I don't know what Milly will say to a strange gentleman coming to dinner: but I could n't help it, could I now? I'd better tell her at once, and get it off my mind."

"I'll say good night, then," said Miss Pinnifer. "I've left my brother too long alone already."

Mr. Todd wished her good-evening, and dived into a small parlor behind the shop, where his daughter, Milly, sat sewing, with three younger brother Todds, making more or less noise, around her.

Milly Todd deserves a paragraph all to herself, as the pleasantest possible specimen of a good little English girl. She was not a beauty, but better than a beauty in the possession of the more lasting comeliness which is derived from a bright smile, a sweet temper, and a pair of clear, earnest eyes, made none the less expressive by the near neighborhood of a snowy little retreating nose. Her warm brown hair had not a ripple out of place, and her plump little figure was encased in a well-fitting dress, which, though it bore the marks of long service, was neatness itself. In fact, take her altogether, — but that is precisely what you would have wished to have done; or, if you did not, you must have had very bad taste indeed. There are some women one always wants to kiss at first sight, and Milly was one of them.

John Todd entered the room in a high state of excitement. "Milly, my girl, here's a most tremendous go!"

"Why, father dear, what ever is the matter?"

"Matter enough, my dear. Here's a gentleman coming to spend Christmas-day with us. Invited himself, and accepted with thanks."

"He won't have much of a dinner, then, father dear; but he's welcome. Let me guess who it is, — not old Mr. Bellamy?"

"No, my dear, it isn't old Mr. Bellamy, nor young Mr. Collins either, though I dare say he'll find his way here in the course of the afternoon, eh, Milly? No, this is quite a stranger; quite the gentleman, too, I can tell you."

"But what makes him want to come here, then, father?"

"Well, my dear, that's more than I can tell you, except that he said he was a stranger and had no friends, and that he thought from my face that he could spend a merry Christmas here. That's all nonsense, of course; but the long and the short of it is, he's coming."

"Nonsense, indeed, for anybody to like my dear old father's face," said Milly, kissing him. "It's handsomer than half the young ones now, and I like the gentleman for saying it. No friends! that's very sad. Poor old gentleman, I'm very glad he's coming; but I wish we had a little more to give him."

"That's where it is, Milly; so do I; but we must make the best of it. What have you got?"

"Well, father, I've a nice bit of beef, and Miss Pinnifer is going to bring some sausages. I'm going to make a pudding, but it'll be only a kind of a make-believe to please the boys. They would n't believe it was Christmas, you know, without the pudding. It isn't much of a dinner to set before a visitor, father."

"Never mind, my dear," said her father, "I wish it was more; but we must make it do. Make the pudding as good as you can. Let me see. I know I have n't much in my pocket — only eightpence. Well, my dear, every little helps. I sha'n't want my half-pint of beer to-night."

"Dear old father! No, no; you're not going without your supper, sir, I can tell you, for any amount of grand visitors. I know what I can do. I've got half a crown up-stairs that I had put by for something else, but it does n't matter, and that will help us out capitally."

With a bright smile, though with a little choking at the throat (for the half-crown had been saved by pennies to buy a necktie for a certain Charley Collins, whose acquaintance we shall make by and by), Milly rose to seek her hoard; but her father stopped her.

"No, no, dear, keep your money, we may want it worse before the week's out. I did n't want to have told you bad news to-night, but perhaps it's best told, after all."

Having taken the plunge, John proceeded to tell his daughter of Mr. Sprague's visit, and the terrible threat with which he had departed. The announcement produced a very depressing effect. Even brave little Milly had tears in her eyes, and her younger brothers, seeing her distress, howled dismally in vague sympathy.

At this juncture the shop-door was heard to open. A man entered bearing on his shoulder a huge hamper, which he set down on the floor with a bang. "Parcel for Mr. Todd." And without another word he departed.

The whole of the Todd family gathered round the big hamper, and contemplated it with silent astonishment. "Who can it be from?" said Milly, a little ungrammatically. "I wonder what's in it?" said John Todd, junior. "I hope it's something to eat," said Tommy Todd, an epicure of nine. Willie Todd, aged six, sucked his thumb and said nothing. Probably he thought the more.

"Hadn't you better open it, and then you'll know all about it?" said John Todd.

"Dear old father," said Milly; "he's always right. So we will."

John Todd, junior, produced a knife, and the hamper was speedily opened. The first glance revealed nothing but straw, and the hearts of the youthful Todds sank almost to zero. But the straw was quickly removed, and then was revealed, first a most remarkable turkey, — a turkey, if possible, inconveniently stout, with a red ribbon round its neck and a rosette on its breast. Second, a roasting pig, which for size and fatness might have been brother, or cousin at least, to the turkey. I don't suppose there ever was a roasting pig quite as broad as he was long; but if ever there was such a pig, that was the one. Last came a hare, of which it is only necessary to say that he did no discredit to the turkey and the pig. Before the party had recovered from their delight and surprise, the door again opened, and another man, bearing another hamper, came in. "Name of Todd here?" said the man. "Right; with Mr. Brown's kind regards, and paid." The door had hardly closed upon the porter when the youthful Todds, regardless of the "Glass, with care," in large letters on the top of the basket, rushed at it, and had it open in a trice. A fragrant smell arose from it, proceeding from sundry whitey-brown paper parcels arranged in trim order within. Milly opened them. One was found to contain currants, another plums, another spice; in fine, all the ingredients for a monster pudding of the richest character were there. A noble packet of tea was the next thing that came to hand, and then a goodly store of apples, oranges, nuts, almonds, and raisins. When these were removed there was still a layer of something solid at the bottom of the basket, which, being investigated, proved to consist of a splendid plum-cake, and bottles of brandy, gin, and rum, with one of ginger wine. The little Todds executed a pas de all sorts round the hampers in a perfect ecstasy of delight, and Milly and her father, though less demonstrative in their transports, were hardly less excited. Before they had recovered from their fresh surprise a scuffling was heard outside the door, as if something was rubbing against it. Milly opened it, and found outside a boy, whose face was just visible over an enormous bundle of holly and mistletoe. He struggled into the shop with his burden. "Please 'm, Mr. Brown's compliments, and thought you might like a little 'olly and miz for the Christmas decorations. O my! ain't it prickly neither." Whereat he dropped it in a heap on the floor and disappeared.

"Now, father dear," said Milly, "you had better shut up the shop—I'm sure you won't be able to do any more work to-night. Isn't it wonderful?—just like a fairy tale!"

"And Mr. Brown's the good fairy!" said John Todd. "Is n't he a noble gentleman? Well, I think I'll shut up, dear. He said he was n't in a hurry for the things, and I don't feel as if I could bring my mind down again to trousers to-night."

"That's a dear old daddy," said Milly. "And now then you shall have your beer and your pipe, and sit in the corner, and see us put up this lovely holly. Isn't it beautiful! What a dear old gentleman Mr. Brown must be! I declare I quite love him already!"

"Halloa!" said Mr. Todd, "what 'll Charley Collins say to that?"

Milly rushed at him, and shut his mouth with a kiss.

"Be quiet, do, you wicked old man, that's quite a different thing, you know it is." And she forthwith began, with the assistance of her brothers, to decorate the homely room with the Christmas evergreens. It was worth a day's pay to anybody (say the Lord Chancellor, as his wages are tolerably good) to see Milly's lithe little figure stepping from chair to chair, or standing like a lively little statue, on the ricketiest of tables, her arms held high above her head, and her dainty little white fingers flashing among the dark-green holly, and deftly insinuating sprigs of mistletoe into artful places where nobody would expect them. And when at last, having hung holly and mistletoe in all possible, and two or three impossible, places, she sprang lightly to the floor, with her sunny face flushed, and her hair the least bit tumbled by her exertions, and led out her father by both hands for the first kiss under the mistletoe, I don't wonder that the boys hurrahed, — I believe I should have done it myself under the same circumstances. I'm afraid, by the way, that I've done those same boys great injustice. It may possibly be imagined, as I have not chronicled their remarks, that they were silent. O dear, no. Quite the reverse. The fact is, they not only all three talked at once, but they all talked the whole time, with an effect which it is easy to imagine, but exceedingly difficult to describe. Had Providence made me three first-rate short-hand reporters, instead of only one gentleman of medium size, I might have attempted it; though even then I (we, I should say) should have found much difficulty by reason of the idiomatic nature of the young gentlemen's conversation. The number of "gollys" and "crikeys" with which it was embellished was, I regret to say, much above what is considered correct in polite society, and (like the organ-man's monkey, who never would dance but to the genteelst of tunes) I find I never can spell those vulgar words. At last the merry party retired to rest, the boys to dream of roast pig, and Milly of — Well, never mind, we won't intrude, but don't you wish you were Charley Collins?

II.

Christmas morning came at last, as it generally will, if you only wait long enough; and a very respectable sort of Christmas morning it was. Bright and clear and cold, with the snow on the ground crisp and hard, the sort of weather that makes one wish one was a street boy, and not too dignified to cut in on a good long slide; the sort of weather that makes you button up your great-coat to the chin, and ease your hands in your thickest woollen gloves; the sort of weather (I hope) that makes you give a kindly thought to your poorer brothers who have no great-coats to button, and no warm gloves to cover their frost-nipped hands. Pile on the logs, by all means; heap up the blazing fire; do honor to the dainty cheer, and pass round the rare old wine. But little they know of Christmas who think to win its magic gifts of light and life and joy by such means only. A single spark, lit by your bounty in a poor man's hovel, shall shed a warmth that the roaring fire in your own mansion cannot give, — a warmth that goes straight to the heart. The frugal meal, spread by the rich man in the poor man's home, shall bring to the giver a sweeter sense of enjoyment than the most sumptuous banquet spread for self alone. Happy he who has found the golden key — who knows, and uses the knowledge, that the treasures of Christmas happiness are reached through Christmas charity.

The whole of the Todd family woke up in a thoroughly Christmas state of mind, and the younger members (as might, perhaps, be expected, considering the nature of their dreams), with a perfectly ferocious appetite, — two or three appetites each, indeed. Breakfast over, the junior branches were despatched, under the care of dear old Todd, to church, while Sister Milly remained at home, and devoted all her energies to the preparation of the anticipated banquet. I am inclined to think that Milly had never seen, much less cooked, such a dinner in her life; but cooks, like poets, are born not made; and with the aid of Miss Pinnifer, and the simultaneous use of all the fireplaces in the house, Milly got on splendidly, and astonished herself with her success. It was in a moment of confidence, engendered by the close and intimate relation in which they were thus placed, that Miss Pinnifer imparted to Milly a secret.

"Milly, my dear," said Miss Pinnifer, "I want your advice."

"Had n't you better ask father?" said Milly, conceiving that his counsels would probably be of greater value than her own.

"No, my dear; no, I think not. In a case of — of this kind, I don't think he would be a judge. I want to know, dear, whether I look best in my black satin spencer and pink muslin skirt, or in my Stuart tartan. Take time to consider, my dear."

"They're both very nice," said Milly. "The tartan for choice, I think."

"Do you, dear? Now I was thinking, do you know, that the tartan was rather — rather old-looking. One does n't want to make one's self quite a middle-aged person, you know, dear."

"Of course not," said Milly; "but I always thought the tartan so very becoming. What makes you so particular to-day?"

"Well, dear, I really hardly know how to tell you. But we girls never can keep our little secrets, can we?" — the dear creature was fifty if she was a day — "the fact is — it's — it's on account of Mr. Brown, dear."

"The object of Mr. Brown's coming, my dear, is, as you are aware, enveloped in mystery. He must have an object, you know, and I have reason to imagine — strong reason, I may say — that that object is myself."

"You don't say so!" said Milly. "Pray accept my best congratulations. Has he declared his intentions —"

"Well, no, dear, I can't say he has exactly declared himself, in words at least; but if you had only seen how he looked — you could n't mistake his expression, my dear. He looked at me with a positive smile, quite lover-like, I assure you. And then he insisted on coming to dinner."

"Well, dear, I'm sure I'm very pleased," said Milly. "We've all been puzzled to account for his wanting to come, and I dare say that's it. You won't forget old friends when you are a grand lady, will you?"

"I have n't accepted him yet, my dear," said Miss Pinnifer, "and I sha' n't either, the first time of asking. It does n't do for a girl to make herself too cheap. He'll have to be very attentive, I can tell him, if he expects to have any chance with me. O dear! O dear! he's beginning to burn!"

THE Vicomte H. de Beaumont has just published his "Études Théoriques et Pratiques sur la Pisciculture." These ichthyological studies form the work that was "crowned" last year at the scientific and literary congress which met at Rodez.

It is remarked as a singular circumstance in the South African diamond-diggings that all the diamonds have been found by natives, and not by Europeans. The natives go on all-fours, scanning the surface and scraping with their nails: while the European tries to maintain the dignity of an erect attitude.

JERUSALEM in the present day is one of the last places for literary production. An unedited tale from "The Thousand and One Nights" has, however, been printed there this year, with a French translation by M. Charles L. Ganneau. It is the History of the Fisherman Caliph and of the Caliph Haroun al Rashid.

THE people of Manchester, England, are giving signs of a resolve not to be behind in the attempt to give women a higher education. In the notice of the bill for the Owens College Extension to be brought before Parliament during the next session, special provision is made for the teaching of female on precisely the same terms as male students.

THE death is announced at an advanced age of the Rev. William Harness, the school-fellow and friend of Lord Byron. Mr. Harness was well known in the field of literature by his edition of "Shakespeare," and his contributions to the Quarterly, to Fraser's, and Blackwood's Magazines. His last undertaking was writing the introduction to the "Life of Mary Russell Mitford," which he just lived to see published.

"THE GRAPHIC" is the title of a new illustrated paper of the highest class, just started in London. Its editor is understood to be Mr. Sutherland Edwards. Its artistic staff numbers Mr. Armitage, A. R. A., Mr. Faed, R. A., Sir F. Grant, P. R. A., Mr. W. P. Frith, R. A., &c., &c. The engraving is intrusted to Mr. W. L. Thomas. The Graphic is to be notable both for its literary and artistic excellence, and promises to be a formidable rival to the old London Illustrated News.

STEAMBOATS on the American principle are to be introduced on the Lake of Geneva: Travellers by this line will have the further advantage of being permitted to leave the steamers at any port they choose, and continuing their journey by rail, a mutual system of tickets having been arranged between the hitherto rival companies. The cause of this unwonted enterprise on the part of the Swiss capitalists is said to be the rumor which has reached them that a Scotch firm had been applying for permission to run steamers on the lake.

ACCORDING to the English papers, the Poet Laureate is building for himself "a lordly pleasure house," as the gentleman who is making £4,000 a year by poetry can well afford to do. He has cleared some fine forest land on the Surrey Hills, not far from Godalming, and is erecting there a spacious dwelling, surrounded by extensive grounds. It has already received the name of Tennyson House. There are many eligible building-sites in the neighborhood, and it is anticipated that the pleasure of having so clever a neighbor will draw a great number of citizens and others to the spot.

It is reported that the Egyptian bands and the dancing-girls played an important part in the welcome recently given to the French Empress at Cairo. Some of these bands were composed of fifteen or twenty players, others had only three or four, and these, with their bagpipes and cymbals, and their wild Saracenic airs, sounded strangely out of place in those crowded streets. Most of all the throngs clustered round the dancing-girls, whose posturings are altogether indescribable; certainly no description can prepare one for their outrageous indecency. These exhibitions are now scarce in Cairo, as the Government has set its face against them, and it is only upon occasions of this sort that they are to be witnessed in the open street.

THE Courrier de Saigon states that some heavy rains in that colony had apparently caused a commotion amongst the tigers. "One of these animals was captured at Baria. Two others were taken alive in traps, at Long-thanh. A third tiger in the same district crept one night into the telegraph office. Scared by the outcries of the agents, it made its escape, leaving in its passage across the palisades numerous traces of its claws and tufts of hair. At Rach Gia two Annamites hunting the wild boar were surprised by a tigress, which seized one of them, upon which his companion, who was armed with a lance, pierced the tigress with his weapon, while she was on the body of the other hunter, and killed her. At the Thehinh an enormous tigress was captured on the 1st of September, which, while in the trap, gave birth to three cubs. The parent and her progeny have been taken to the Botanical Gardens at Saigon, while, to make room for them, one of those magnificent tigers which it at present possesses will be transmitted to the Jardin des Plantes at Paris."

A BLIND MAN'S LOVE.

I HEARD the humming of the streets forever,
As in a sleep, — the people came and went Around my seat unseen, like shapes that pass
Unseen, but heard, in haunted lands; and oft
Light laughter and a motion close around me,
And gentle speech, disturb'd me. What to me
Was beauteous interchange of day and night, —
The coming and the going of the sun,
Gathering grayness, and the rising moon, —
And what to me was light of sun or stars,
Since light and darkness came and went around,
Unmark'd by weary eyes that could not see,
That had not seen the day for seven years;
Only, when sunlight daily went away,
My world grew stiller, colder, — that was all.

And I was hard and dull at twenty-three, —
Dull with my grief, hard to the core from dwelling,
Sleeping or waking, in the dark so long;
One, and one pleasure only, had the power to stir
And trouble all my soul, until it felt
A sunshine of its own. A light footfall,
A tender greeting, fluttering of a dress,
A touch as soft as is a rose's leaf,
That flutters to the grass and makes no sound, —
These were the intimations of a world
Beyond my sorrow, the admonishings
Which sweeten'd that dull gloom wherein I dwelt.
O, sweeter far than any beauteous thing
The eye could look upon, one little name,
One little soft sweet name, I murmur'd o'er,
Softly, to keep my heart still: ah! the name,
The little living name I murmur'd o'er,
And saw in golden letters in the dark!
May! May! May! May! — it brought me back the time

When I could see the roses and the leaves,
The silver splash of water, the blue hills
Netted in sunny weather! May! May! May!
I murmur'd it forever to my heart,
For joy, for joy of it! . . . Sweeter than all
To sit within my shadow-land, and hear
That one voice singing, while a little hand
I could not see, swept o'er the trembling keys.
And all the air around me seem'd to melt
Into a vapor, in whose midst there sat
One sweet girl-shape before an instrument,
Her bright curls shining, and her eyes of blue Looking on me! Then the sweet sound would cease,

The vision made of music died away,
And I was wearying in the dark again.

At seventeen, a fever struck me down,
And I arose, and found the world was gone,
And nothing but a shadow world remain'd.
Six weary years we dwelt in London town,
My mother seeking for her stricken son
Such help and skill as only could be found
In that great cloud of sound; for such it was,
And nothing more, to me. But naught avail'd!
All skill fell powerless — still those weary eyes
Beheld not — still I wearied and grew hard —
Still moan'd and pray'd to God that I might die, Till that new friend, a neighbor's child, came near,
Made light of music, gave my soul within Eyes to perceive and passion to create,
And haunted me with touch, and scent, and sound,
Such as made darkness more divine at times
Than seeing and the sunshine.

Then at last,
Strange as a trumpet wakening the dead
To wonder and white robes, came blessed light;
Light, light, — a revelation; and I saw.
Yet, for a time, the motion of the world
Look'd dim and ghostly — shapes like phantoms came —

Strange as those wondrous flashes on the ball
Of darkness, and my spirit was oppress'd
With the unaccustom'd burden of the sense.
Slow, as a lily opens, leaf by leaf,
Light deepen'd — brightening, brightening — till at last,
Full-orb'd, great, golden as a lily's heart,
Unclosed God's perfect day.

Then, as I sat,
Breathless with the new bliss of the bright world,
Soft motion and the flutter of a dress
Disturb'd me. Turning, radiant as a rose,
I saw a face I knew not; — strange and meek,
Not beauteous — eyes not luminous, looks not light,
Like those which I had pictured in my dream;
Yet the face smiled upon me eagerly,
And lighten'd as it smiled, — while, darkening,
I flush'd and murmur'd inarticulate words,
And, trembling like a leaf, she cried aloud
In the same voice that I had loved so long
In darkness — in the same beloved voice
That I had fondled in my shadow-land.
“Do you not know me? I am May!” whereon
I shiver'd and felt cold.

For all the world
Seem'd bitter and a cheat. The face I dream'd,
The light young delicate face with eyes of blue,
Had faded in the golden light of day;

And in its place a pensive twilight cheek,
A common creature of the clay, with eyes
Not luminous like the eyes I made it dream, Linger'd and smiled. The world seem'd suddenly
Stale and unprofitable — all the bliss of light
Was bitter — all the fragrant sense of love Seem'd like a wither'd feast-day posy found
At daybreak, when the revellers are gone,
In the stale-smelling ball-room of the feast.
Then I beheld her, like a frighten'd hind,
With widening eyeballs shrink, and feeling shamed
To look so coldly on my little friend,
I squeezed a feeble smile into my cheeks,
And took her hand: she, fluttering from my touch,
Stood musing; and I saw her as she lived —
A pensive woman, delicate-limb'd and small,
With brown hair braided o'er Madonna brows,
And dark eyes suffering from the gentle light
They shed on others: on her brow the light Falling subdued and gentle. This my May!
This golden-hair, the spirit of my dream!
Nay, then, the world was bitter and a cheat!

Ah, love, my love! come nearer. Let me kiss
The broad, pure brow; and, kissing, may I kiss Away all sorrow. Sweeter this soft hair,
Silver'd with the miraculous snows of time,
Than all the luminous looks that e'er beguiled
Rash sailors to the shallows! Yet, at first,
This perfect face repell'd me — it arose
Coldly, like something strange, to which the voice
I knew so well seem'd alien; and I loathed
The light for changing thee!

Then, for long days
The face withdrew, and left me to my thoughts.
And the streets murmur'd, and the world look'd bright,
And shadow-land had died into a dream.
Ne'er had I felt so utterly alone!
Yea, darkness had been blest society;
But now the light was solitude indeed.

Now shall I tell by what slow witchery,
Dear love, I grew to yearn for those soft eyes
And that pale, asking face. How, in the light
That was as darkness, unaware, again
I hearken'd for thy foot; and how I wept,
When from a distant chamber came to mine
The trouble of thy singing. Then I cried
Thy name out loudly, like a fever'd man,
And gently up before me rose again
The twilight of thy face; and all at once
I felt I loved it — not as young men love —
Not with the fever'd humor of the flesh —
Not as I loved that wondrous face in dream —
But strangely, clingingly, and helplessly,
As weary men ask rest, as fever'd lips
Crave coolness, as in the parch'd Syrian sands,
Under the sun's insufferable blaze,
Men seek the shadow of the locust-tree.

Yea, how I love thee! Dearest, draw the blind,
And do not light the lamp, but let me sit
In darkness as of old; and play to me
The tune I loved so in my shadow-land,
When I conceived thee other than thou wert,
Yet never purer, dearer! . . . So, O Soul,
What pictures come and fade before thy sight!
All life is hush'd — the world, the daylight,
To twilight and a silvery star of sound!

THE DEATH PENALTY.

A NARRATIVE.

BY JULES SIMON.

[Translated from the French by MR. W. H. HUNTINGTON for EVERY SATURDAY.]

PART FIFTH.

IX.

LIFE is woven of such strange stuff that one man's ill is too often another's good. "I wish them no evil," said Marion, "much as they have caused us. I repelled the thought of encouraging Jean Louis to inform against them. I hope now that they will have pity on him and his brothers, whom they can save without making their own case the worse." Exhausted as she was by the unremitted strain of the preceding days, she persisted on going out forthwith to inquire what they might have already disclosed. We had to traverse nearly the entire length of the town to come to M. Jourdan's house. Several individuals who knew Marion by sight, and admired her modest self-sacrifice, stopped her on her way to congratulate her. "Yes, yes," she said, "I trust that the good God will take pity on us at last." Unhappily, M. Jourdan had no good news to tell us. "I have seen them," he said, "yesterday and this morning, and I must tell you between ourselves they are arrant brigands. Their system at present is to make a show of their political principles, though it is easy to see that for them politics has been merely a pretext. A party is truly unfortunate to be invoked by such men: but that is a shame and grief which have never been spared to the vanquished of any opinions." I found my old friend unusually prolix that morning. Marion comprehended nothing of all his fine phrases, and turned her questioning eyes alternately on me and M. Jourdan; he still kept to his commonplaces. I was not long in perceiving that he did not wish to explain himself before her.

I interrupted him to say, "You judge her ill; she can bear the brutal truth; she is as strong to endure her own burdens as she is tender and generous in consoling others under theirs."

"Well, then, my poor child," said M. Jourdan, taking her hands in his, "they do but aggravate the position of our friends. They openly boast of the crime of Bignan and accuse your husband and his brothers of having lent them assistance."

Marion displayed no emotion, but arose, took her mantle, and moved toward the door.

"You are going to the prison," said M. Jourdan; "but you cannot drag yourself as far as there. Take at least a glass of wine."

"I shall be glad to, indeed," she answered, "for it is true, I am worn out; and here is this gentleman," pointing to me, "who is not used to hardship as I am, and who must be suffering more than I am."

The poor woman was faithful to her instinct in thinking first of others; but the anxiety that tortured me then above all others came from her. I had remarked the giving away of her physical force during this last journey; I knew that the family had shut up their house on coming to Vannes to await the issue of the trial, and I asked myself on what had they been living for the past two months in the Rue du Mené? As for Marion, it was not her husband she was going to see. She was going where the call was the loudest, that is, to those who were able to save the life of all of them. I went with her only as far as the door, for she remarked that they would be perhaps less distrustful and more generous with her if she were alone. She came back at the end of half an hour, her eyes red and swollen, and said nothing. When we passed before the cross by the college, she crossed herself and said, speaking in a low voice, "They are heathens."

Such an outcome of so many hopes and efforts turned my heart cold. I went in with her to her parents. The mother was in bed, which now she never left. The old father was on his stool in his customary place. He turned his head quickly toward her without uttering a word; but his eyes spoke. Marion lowered hers; he resumed his dejected attitude without further movement. Marion went straight to the bed and carefully smoothed the coverings. Then she swept the room, and after that took her seat on the other stool, on the side of the fireplace opposite her father, with her distaff. I meantime, using the freedom of friendship, had been prying into all corners, and acquired the certainty that bread and money were wanting. "Yes, it is true," she said; for although I had not spoken, she perceived that I had discovered her position. "I cannot earn more than six sous a day by spinning, and when I am not here the poor old people do without everything. Tell the baker as you go by that you will answer for us. You shall not lose your money, M. Jules: for after all this, we shall sell the house out there and pay you the debt."

"I will send you something also to make a soup for your patient, Marion."

She looked at her mother-in-law, and said, after a pause, "For us peasants, it is enough if we are sure of the bread; — and do as I say and nothing more; it will be better for us so."

As I was descending the dark stairs, I heard the poor crazed mother calling to her children, "Yvonic! My Jean Louis!" I stopped, listening a moment; the voice of the father rose, reciting a prayer.

X.

I will not relate the story of the days that followed, nor all the incidents of the new process that was in preparation. The death of Brossard was but one item in the case of Le Pridoux and Jean Brien, for they were charged with two other murders. They persisted throughout in maintaining that the brothers Nayl had accompanied the band voluntarily to the house of M. Brossard, that they knew beforehand the work that was to be done there, and stood by in arms at its performance.

When they were all confronted the Nayls repelled these allegations with the greatest energy. They asserted that the refractories had kept them in complete ignorance of their design; that as soon as they could have any suspicion of a crime, they did their utmost to oppose it and that, even at the moment when Brossard was struck the first blow, a struggle was going on between them and the assassins. Jean Louis showed the traces of two considerable bruises, which he declared had been inflicted in the contest; but they were gagged, bound, and forced to be mere powerless spectators of the crime. From that time they wandered about with the others, more as prisoners than as companions, and threatened with death on the first attempt at evasion. Yvonic related in the fullest detail the manner of their escape, which they were enabled to effect during an alarm, and how they had taken refuge in a charcoal-burner's hut, where the gendarmes arrested them the next day. This statement, in which the brothers never varied, and which they all gave with the air and tone of truth, had an impressive effect on the mind of the examining magistrate, despite its improbability.

The causes had been separated, and the Nayls were to be tried at the assizes of Caen in the Calvados; but they were retained at Vannes because their presence was necessary in preparing the other process. The hope of arriving at some discovery that might benefit them was not abandoned. The King's attorney had inspired the whole court, and I may add all the town, with his own solicitude. It was generally thought that the jury of Caen would take into account the condemnation of Le Pridoux and Jean Brien, the tortures of a death sentence already once undergone, the long delays of a second trial, the youth and good antecedents of the brothers, and the now assured fact that the murder of Brossard had not been directly committed by them, — their crime, if they were criminal, being at most the having been present in arms at its execution. If the new trial did not result in a capital sentence, the king might remit the penalty of the galleys.

To escape from the galleys and from death was henceforth all our hope; for the obstinate refusal of Le Pridoux and his accomplice to admit the statement of the brothers, destroyed any expectation of an acquittal. When the Nayls were heard as witnesses at the assizes in Vannes, the public anxiously followed their words. All eyes were turned towards the accused, and their denials excited murmurs throughout the hall. The venerable M. Le Gall, who presided, conjured them with tears in his eyes to tell the truth. All the interest of the public was with the formerly condemned, whose acquittal they were beginning to hope for, while every one, without distinction of party, looked on the new prisoners with loathing. Their response was constantly the same. They repeated that the Nayls went to the house of the unhappy Brossard entirely of their own will and fully aware of what was to be done there; that the resistance they talked about was an absurd invention; that the refractories had resolved with one accord, at supper at the miller's, to strike a grand blow for the sake of frightening informers; that they honestly pitied the Nayls but could not lie to save them. Such declarations, uttered with the firmest assurance, disconcerted all conjectures. Sentence was passed in the evening, and the next morning a closed carriage, escorted by gendarmes, took away the brothers to the jail at Caen.

Le Pridoux and Jean Brien let pass the interval allowed for an appeal without making any demand, so that three days after their condemnation the report spread in the town that their execution would take place on the morrow. I repaired forthwith to Marion's lodging for the purpose of inducing her to leave Vannes immediately. On reaching the door, I saw a table covered with a napkin, on which was a crucifix and holy water. Madame Nayl had died in the morning. Her reason had returned at the moment of her dying, and she was again sensible of all the horror of her situation. The corpse was watched by some women of the neighborhood and by Abbé Le Ber, who was always sure to be found with the poor and unfortunate. I looked around for M. Nayl and his daughter, and was surprised not to see them, for the custom of the Bretons is not to quit their dead.

"They are at the prison with Moisan," said Abbé Le Ber.

M. Moisan was the chaplain of the prisons, whose mournful and sublime office it was to prepare the condemned for death. He was doubly unfortunate that day, for he shared our feelings and convictions, and for the first time in his life was trying to fit men for death whom he could not love.

"It is the dead mother," said M. Le Ber, who desired them to make a new appeal to the condemned in her name, — "'Tell them that I shall hear their words when I am with God,' was her last of speech. Nayl rose up, closed her eyes, kissed her on the mouth, and they went out."

I knelt with the rest to pray. Nearly an hour passed by. There was the usual coming and going of people, who sprinkled holy water on the body. At last we heard a great tumult and loud sobbing. It was Marion they were bringing in, her eyes wildly staring, her mouth foaming, under a violent nervous attack that resembled epilepsy. The death of her mother-in-law, the interview with the condemned, the idea of their execution so near at hand, had been too much for her; the strong, calm nature had given way at last.

When she was within the funereal cell, and had heard the murderers repeat their cruel denials; when she saw Nayl uncover his white hairs and drag himself at their feet uttering heart-rending sobs, she lost all control of herself; and at one moment it was feared she was dying. The corpse was placed on trestles, in order to lay Marion on the only bed. I ardently wished that the delirium might last for twenty-four hours. Poor Nayl would hold locked in his trembling hands the hands of his well-loved daughter, then go weeping to kiss his old companion. I felt that night more sorrow perhaps, and surely more distress, than I had experienced after the condemnation of my three friends. For our only light a resin torch had been procured; and pious women prayed in turn through the night. For ourselves, we remained silent; I saw the great tears roll down the old man's cheeks and did not seek to restrain my own. Marion fell asleep a little before daybreak. I listened attentively, for I knew that the execution would take place in the early morning and that the death-bell would be tolled at all the churches. At the first dismal note, Nayl crossed himself; Marion started up with open eyes; she listened to the bells, looked at the body of her mother, and showed that she had her full reason. As her clothing had not been removed when she was laid on the bed, she arose and going first to embrace her father, threw herself on my neck, and burst into tears. It was the first time she had given me such a proof of affection. It was right in her to treat me as a brother, for I was one for her in heart, and, after so many years, am so still. This first movement over, she dried her eyes and set about arranging the room with her wonted calm. I had arranged that the burial should take place at an early hour, and soon the men came to remove the body. There were only we three behind the bier, and as we were descending towards Saint Patern's, we had to work through the crowd coming up toward the fair-ground, where the scaffold was raised.

XI.

Two days afterward, in my garret in the Rue des Chanoines, I was reflecting on the position of all our friends, and thinking of a means of overcoming Marion's delicacy, and making her accept the money she needed to go to Caen and take her father there, when to my astonishment I saw her enter the room.

"Good day," Jules, she said in her soft, quiet tones. "I come to bid you good by and to ask a service of you."

"Speak, Marion," I replied; "you know that I shall do everything you wish."

"You are not rich," she went on, "and we,"—here she hesitated and reddened a little,— "we are no better than beggars at present. You went yesterday and paid our lodging and the baker; you have perhaps gone in debt for our sakes; but kind hearts mind nothing when it is to help others. Now, I must go my way, and my father must go to Caen. For myself,"—and she blushed again,— "I want nothing; but there is need of money for my father. One has good courage in asking, M. Jules," she continued, "when it is not asking for one's self. I am come to beg you to make a collection for us; see if you can bear to do that. You must say plainly that it is alms I am asking for; for I no longer expect to be able to repay to our benefactors the money they may give us."

Her voice was steady; but I who knew her and posals, could only the more admire the integrity and firmness of her soul.

"Where are you going then, Marion?" I inquired; "and why are you quitting your father?"

"The mother of Le Pridoux is living," she replied. "She could speak if she would. I will go and kneel to her and ask her for the life of my husband. After that, if I fail again, may God have pity on us."

On inquiring where the mother of Le Pridoux lived, she said, "At Elven. It is only five leagues and good walking all the way; it is on the high-road."

"I will go first and do what you request," I said, "and then set out with you."

"No, M. Jules, I must set out now, without losing a minute; and I have counted on you to watch over the father and put him in the carriage; for at present he needs to be cared for like a child." Holding out her hand, she said, "Adieu, if I succeed I shall see you again."

I suffered her to depart, and ran to M. Jourdan, my ordinary Providence. The old advocate was richer in good works than crown pieces; he had, however, a horse in his stable, because he was obliged to make frequent short journeys in the course of his profession. He saddled him himself, and had a cushion adapted to the cantel of the saddle for a woman to sit on. He then called a boy of twelve years old, who served him for domestic, and bade him hasten after Marion on the road to Elven, to take her up and carry her on and bring her back. He put some sous in his pocket and gave him a basket of provisions.

"And now for your case," he said, when we had seen the boy off. "Here is a crown of six francs for your traveller. I hope to pick up a score of francs at the court. Good by and good luck."

I proceeded straight to the college, where I had been rarely seen of late, and posted myself by the door while my comrades were entering, holding my hat in my hand. I felt proud of this humiliating position, thinking of the noble woman for whose sake I was holding it. All the dealers in cakes and marbles did a poor business that day, and I am sure that more than one boy preferred going to bed supperless rather than pass by me without emptying his pocket. Nayl was enabled to set off next day in the rotonde of the diligence, with a purse of a hundred francs, and three letters of recommendation, procured for him by M. Jourdan.

XII.

Our little man did not overtake Marion till three leagues beyond Vannes, because she had started so long before. She was walking with difficulty, worn out with grief and hunger, but upheld by a strong will. He jumped down from his horse and told her he was sent by M. Jourdan to attend her.

"Say, rather, it is the good God who sends you," she replied; "I was afraid I must end by the roadside."

Thanks to this aid, she arrived toward four o'clock at Elven. She went straight to the church and prayed at the altar of the Virgin. She then addressed herself to the sacristan, who was lighting the tapers for vespers, and inquired for the house of Le Pridoux.

"It is the last house towards Jocelyn, my child; but if you come from Vannes," he added, "you know they are in mourning there."

heart ready to sink within her. The house she was seeking stood a little back from the others, its window facing a littered courtyard. When she first opened the door, she could distinguish nothing within; but as her eyes adapted themselves to the obscurity, she perceived an old woman seated on the hearthstone. A distaff was lying on the ground beside her, and she held a chaplet in her hands, of which she forgot to count the beads.

"May the good God give you strength," said Marion on coming in; but the widow did not hear her. She approached so near as to touch her, and said, "I am come to see you in your affliction with a heart as stricken as yours." At this the widow became sensible of her presence and looked at her for an instant. Then she turned away her head, with a gesture of the hand as if to repulse her. "No," said Marion, "I cannot go away; and pardon me for coming to disturb you in your sorrow; but it is more than my life that I ask of you." And so speaking, she fell on her knees and stretched out her hands to the desolate mother. But the other repelled her again, for in her wretchedness she did not believe that any one could talk to her of sorrow, unless in mockery. She strove to speak, and her voice died in her throat. At last she uttered the words, "My son is dead!" and pointed at the same time to the door of her cottage.

"But I," said Marion, always kneeling, "I am the wife of Jean Louis Nayl!"

"Ah, poor woman!" said the widow, "and you are weeping for your husband as I weep for my boy!"

"He is not dead," returned Marion, "and you can save him if you will. A word from you, one word of truth, can restore us all to life! I ask it of you in the name of the Virgin Mary, in the name of the salvation of your child!" and she shed so many tears, that the hands of the widow were all wet. "Do not refuse me," she continued, "if you have the heart of a woman! I will pray for you and for your son all the days of my life! Judge of our sorrow by the sorrow that is on you! Mercy! mercy! in the name of the Virgin, in the name of Jesus Christ."

The unhappy mother remained long sunk in gloomy silence; but at last her heart melted and she wept. Then followed sobs and spasms. Marion took her in her arms, kissed her hands and her cheeks, drew her head to her bosom and mingled her own tears with hers. When the night was fallen they were still on that cold hearthstone, locked in each other's arms, and the mother was talking of her son. She recounted all his childhood and youth; the days when he was so ill, and she thought she was about to lose him, and disputed him with death; the tenderness he had for her in the midst of his irregular life: she excused his crimes as she best could, for there was something of the zealot in her nature, and she had sucked the bloody milk of civil war; but the sentiments of the woman and mother resumed their sway, and then she was stirred to pity at the lot of the unfortunate whom she held in her arms.

She knew all the details of the assassination of Brossard, and knew of two women in Elven who, like herself, could testify to the innocence of the brothers Nayl. The refractories had got them away for fear that the example of Jean Pierre, if he joined his regiment, would become contagious. They had kept the brothers with them as prisoners, and forced them to be present at the murder of Brossard for the sake of compromising them.

Marion reproached herself for the passionate throbbings of her heart, that leaped for gladness in this house of mourning.

As soon as it was day she went to the curé to implore his assistance, and visited with him the two women whom the widow had designated to her.

We saw her coming back on Sunday. Vespers were just over as she stopped at my lodging, for she wished to tell me the good news before even proceeding to M. Jourdan's. The worthy advocate was nearly stifled with emotion. He kissed Marion on both cheeks, and dragged us away to the King's attorney. M. Hervo was so violently affected as for a moment to alarm us; but he quickly recovered himself and declared that he must set off straightway for Elven, with M. Jourdan and myself, to receive juridically the depositions of the three women. He insisted that Marion should stay at his house, and intrusted her to the care of Madame Hervo, who received her like a mother.

When we had the depositions in regular form he came on with us to Bignan, where he had a new description made of the premises, and from there to Saint Allouestre, where, guided by these new indications, he was also able to collect evidence of importance. We had only to leave him to himself; he was as full of ardor as ourselves, and heeded neither trouble nor fatigue. On returning to Vannes he declared his intention of going to Caen in person. His wife told us that he had had no rest from the day that the doubt broke on his mind.

During all the hearing, which was brief, he was to be seen, in citizen's dress, behind the advocate-general, who conducted cases before the jury of the Calvados. When this officer rose to state that he should not plead the accusation, M. Hervo exhibited more emotion than the three brothers, whom this announcement was to restore to liberty and life. Marion rested heavily on my arm, for she could no longer support herself. At this last moment, when nothing was left for her but to gather the fruit of her courage, her strength abandoned her. Jean Louis had his eyes fixed on her, and regarded her as we might regard an angel. The jury took no time for deliberation. In five minutes their verdict was rendered, and the accused were again led in. After having formally pronounced their acquittal, the president, in a voice touched by emotion, and in the midst of a religious silence, addressed them as follows:—

"Yvonic, Jean Pierre, and Jean Louis Nayl, a deplorable fatality has laid on you the responsibility of a crime which you had done all in your power to prevent. The ordeal which you have undergone has been terrible; you come out of it not only innocent, but worthy the sympathy and respect of all men. May the affectionate solicitude that has accompanied you hitherto soften the bitterness of your memories. In restoring you to liberty, the Court is happy to associate itself with your joy and with that of the most worthy, most courageous, noblest of women—"

The judge president shed tears while uttering the last words and there were few in the room not tempted to follow his example. At this juncture, and as the Court was about to rise, M. Hervo left his place, and crossing the entire length of the hall, came up to the accused holding out his arms. One cry broke out from the audience when they saw him surrounded and embraced by the three brothers.

When we found ourselves together again, in the small inn, on the Falaise road, where we had alighted, I do not believe the whole world offered a spectacle worthier the eye of Heaven.

Yvonic is to-day vicar of Guchenno.

It would be indiscreet for me to speak of the important part played by one of his brothers in 1848. As for Marion, she is as gentle and as modest as if she had never had any other merit than that of bringing up her children well, and fondly loving her husband.

POPULAR SONGS OF THE LAST HALF-CENTURY.

BY JOHN HULLAH.

THE student, whether of music or manners, may add a good deal to his knowledge of both by an occasional inspection of one of those dilapidated folio volumes, lettered "Vocal Music," or "Songs, &c." which, though less numerous than they were a few years since, still now and then come under the hand or the eye, more often on the book-stall than the music-desk. They are touching memorials of another age, these decayed and out-at-elbows tomes, of an age not very distant from our own in point of time, but, in feeling, opinion, taste, and manners of life, how far removed!

Catholicity in excess is not the failing of the average musician; and he will perhaps find little that he can like in these old music-books. Yet it may not be useless, nor ought it to be uninteresting, to trace, by the analysis of typical specimens of each epoch, the progress in England, since the latter part of the last century, of a very important — certainly the most popular — branch of musical composition, the Vocal Solo.

The music-book of seventy or eighty years since — that expressive and faithful record of the tastes and powers of our grandmothers — will generally be found to contain songs by one or other, generally by several, of the following composers: Storace, Kelly, Carter, Dibdin, Shield, Arnold, Hook, Davy, Percy, Braham, and Jackson, of Exeter. Of Storace, facile princeps among these, certainly in science and knowledge of effect, perhaps also in invention, there would be "Where the silvered Waters roam" (from The Pirates), "The Sapling Oak" (from The Siege of Belgrade), or "With lowly Suit and plaintive Ditty" (from No Song No Supper). Of Kelly we should find "No! my Love, No!" (from Of Age To-Morrow); and of Carter, the inevitable "O Nanny, wilt thou gang with me?" — like "Auld Robin Gray," a pseudo-Scottish song.

The prolific genius of Dibdin — the poet, the composer, and the singer — would be represented by "Tom Bowling," "Then Farewell, my trim-built Wherry," "Saturday Night at Sea," or "Poor Jack"; and that of the more ambitious Shield, by "Ere around the huge Oak," "The Death of Tom Moody," "Whilst with Village Maids I stray," or "The Wolf." Another bass air, "Flow, thou regal purple Stream," would remind us of Arnold, to whose editorial labors Church musicians and the admirers of Handel owe so large a debt of gratitude. Hook will have contributed "The Lass of Richmond Hill," "Tarry awhile with me, my Love," or "Twas within a Mile o' Edinbro' Town," another forgery on the Scottish muse; Davy, "Just like Love," and "The Bay of Biscay"; Percy, "Wapping Old Stairs"; and Braham, like Dibdin, composer, singer, and even, on occasion, poet, "Slow broke the Light," "No more by Sorrow chased," or "The Bird in yonder Cage confined." Jackson's laurels were for the most part won in other fields, but a volume such as that we are considering would hardly have been held complete without "Encompassed in an Angel's Frame," or "When first this humble Roof I knew." In addition to these songs by contemporary composers, we should find at least one "favorite song by Mr. Handel," probably "Angels ever bright and fair"; and more than one by Dr. Arne, "Water parted from the Sea," or "When Daisies pied," certainly "The Soldier tired." Two or three anonymous productions, — "I am a brisk and sprightly Lad," and "Since then I'm doomed," "Pray Goody," "Over the Mountain and over the Moor," and "The Blue Bells of Scotland" * — would complete the volume.

These songs, like those which make up any contemporary young lady's collection, are of very unequal merit. The intervals from Storace to Kelly, from Shield to Hook, and from Jackson to Davy, are severally very wide ones; but the best and the worst of the compositions which make up our imaginary volume have some good qualities in common. They are almost without exception melodious, well fitted to the words, and "becoming to the voice"; † and in those of them which rise above the level of mere tune, though there is no serious attempt at developing or pursuing musical ideas to their utmost consequences (the distinguishing power of great masters, ancient or modern), the passages are spontaneous and coherent, and grow out of one another naturally, as though, once set growing, they could not have grown otherwise.

Moreover, the composers of these contemporary "favorite" songs were not only men of very unequal powers, but of very various ages. In the last decade of the last century some of them were beginners, others were in the prime, others in the decline of life. Braham had just entered on a career which was only to end in our own time. Shield had reached "the middle of the journey of our life"; Jackson was just attaining its term; while Storace, like Purcell, Linley, Mozart, and Schubert, had already furnished another illustration of the apothegm, "Those whom the gods love die young."

Some of the most successful productions, therefore, of the contributors to our "music-book," were subsequent to its collocation; among them, for instance, "The Death of Nelson," a song which, whatever its shortcomings, has survived by more than half a century the shock caused by the subject of it. It is still popular.

These composers, whatever their merits, whatever their places in public favor at the end of the last century, were destined soon to suffer an eclipse, from which they are still by no means free, from the advent and prolonged course of a composer who perhaps in invention, certainly in science, taste, and facility, surpassed them all. The year 1809 is signalized in the history of English music by the production of The Circassian Bride — an opera (so called, at least, in those days), the music of which was the composition of Henry (more recently Sir Henry) Bishop. From this epoch to the year of his death (in 1860), a period of fifty years, Bishop kept his hold on the public ear more firmly than any English predecessor or contemporary. Not that he was without rivals, — and formidable rivals too; not that he was either the greatest genius or the most

* No longer anonymous. The researches of Mr. Chappell have proved it to be the composition of Mrs. Jordan, the celebrated singer and actress.

† We owe this happy phrase to the late Mr. Braham.

learned and skilful musician of his age and country; but that he was for a great length of time the only Englishman who exercised musical genius and learning in that exact proportion, and in those particular directions, without which public favor at once great and permanent is unattainable to a musical composer. For, the most distinguished contemporaries of Bishop, in his early days at least, were none of them his rivals. Of our four best glee composers, Webbe, Stevens, Callcott, and Horsley, none attempted the musical drama; nor can any vocal solos by these masters, at all comparable in excellence or in quantity to their part-music, be named which could have competed with like works of Bishop, in popular estimation. The same may be said of Wesley, so many of whose noble compositions are, it is believed, still withheld from us; of Crotch, William Russell, J. Stafford Smith, Benjamin Cooke, Spofforth, Danby, and others. Partial exceptions might be made in favor of two or three of these; for Webbe wrote one very successful song, "The Mansion of Peace"; and Callcott's "Angel of Life," "Friend of the Brave," and "Sisters of Acheron"; and Horsley's "When shall we Three meet Again," "My Harp," and "The Tempest," continue to find willing performers, if not always willing listeners. But granting these the utmost allowance of merit and public favor, what are they to the long succession of compositions at once admirable and popular by these same masters, which any experienced part-singer could enumerate, with or without a moment's notice?

Who will venture — with any hope of arriving at the end of the list — to enumerate Sir Henry Bishop's songs, the product (and hardly the chief product) of an artistic life of fifty years, no day of which could have been passed "without a line"? He was "concerned in" about seventy musical dramas in all: few of them, it is true, operas in the proper sense of the word, but all of them supported, adorned, and enriched by a wealth of musical thought which no frequency or extent of call seemed able to exhaust. With the concerted music of Bishop we are not now concerned; it is only with his songs we have to do. Their number, which we have no means — perhaps now there are no means — of ascertaining, is not to be estimated even approximately by that of the dramas to which he contributed music. Many, especially of his later airs, are essentially of the class of chamber music; and if he sometimes borrowed a phrase or a section from a so-called "national" melody, he frequently lent to that often very inane production its single peculiarity or its single grace.

For many years, however, after his first dramatic success, the theatre must have furnished Bishop with occupation sufficient for the most productive and indefatigable of musical composers. We have before us a list (certainly not complete) of his dramatic productions, which, between the year 1806, when he made his first essays, and the year 1824, which closes his first period, number sixty-eight, — nearly four per annum for eighteen years! His part in many of these pieces was limited to instrumentation (in which no precedent Englishman had shown anything like the same skill) and arrangement, i. e. correcting, curtailing, or expanding other people's music; but to others he made large contributions of original matter, — overtures, melodramatic music, concerted pieces, and songs. Among other undertakings he was actively concerned in a species of Shakesperian revival, happily not imitated since, which consisted in turning the dramas of our great poet into melodramas with music. To these experiments we owe some of the best of Bishop's songs. "By the Simplicity of Venus' Doves," "Should he upbraid," and "Bid me dis-couse," are all that are left to us of these profanations of Shakespeare, — profanations, however, which it might be said they all but justify.

No English dramatic musician in any way worthy of comparison with Bishop appeared during the first years of his career. In or about 1820 the compositions of John Barnett — who, as a boy, had attained considerable reputation as a dramatic singer — began to excite attention, and to be treated, though sometimes with severity, always with consideration, by the musical critics of those days. The songs of Mr. Barnett, like those of Sir Henry Bishop, are by no means exclusively operatic, but the majority of the most popular owe their existence to the stage. "The light Guitar," "Rise, gentle Moon," and others which keep, and are likely to keep, their hold on public favor, are many of them the sole remaining memorials of dramas of which they were, no doubt, the most interesting features; and "Farewell to the Mountain," and "Deep in a Forest Dell," are integral parts of the Mountain Sylph — of all the operas (properly so called) yet produced by an Englishman that which seems to us the most likely to live.

The transition from Mr. Barnett to Mr. Balfe is facilitated by the fact of their temporary rivalry, and by that of Mr. Balfe (like Mr. Barnett, a dramatic singer) having played a principal part in one of the latter's operas, Farinelli. The first mention of Mr. Balfe with which we are acquainted is in The Harmonicon (Vol. V. p. 32), wherein a composition of his is criticised somewhat severely. It is spoken of as "a song which evidently means to make some pretensions" (sic). After a complaint that the poetry and the music "do not go on smoothly together," the writer concludes by observing, not altogether grammatically, that "there is, however, merit in parts of the composition which entitle it to notice, though the triteness of the ending," &c. &c. Mr. Balfe, however cast down by this criticism on his youthful production, survived it, and became, as everybody knows, the composer of several operas, the majority of which met with great success. To the first of them produced in England, The Siege of Rochelle, the public is indebted for "When I beheld the Anchor weighed"; to another, The Maid of Artois, for the still more popular "Light of other Days," while the more recent Bohemian Girl gave occasion for "I dreamt that I dwelt in Marble Halls," and "When other Lips." The first-named of these songs was "created" by Mr. Henry Phillips, then in his zenith, and the second by the same excellent artist and — a cornet-à-piston. This "cheap and nasty" trumpet, which holds the same relation to that noble instrument, the trumpet proper, that stucco does to stone, was in those "other days" comparatively a novelty, even in its proper place, — the street band. In combination with a barytone or any other voice it had assuredly never been heard within the walls of an English theatre. The town fairly "went mad about it." Mr. Balfe's graceful but somewhat commonplace melody was exalted to the skies, and the brows of Mr. Bunn, the author of the words, might have ached under the laurels that were heaped upon them. The poet is no longer with us, the voice of the singer is mute, the lyre of the musician is unstrung: but the cornet-à-piston, alas! still "rules," not merely "the camp," but also "the court and grove"; it still adulterates the orchestra, makes "quiet streets" uninhabitable, and continues the pulmonary discipline of athletic undergraduates during the brief intervals of boating and cricket.

Two other composers, Edward Loder and Rooke, became candidates for operatic fame a little before and a little after the production of Mr. Barnett's "Mountain Sylph." Mr. Loder made a considerable impression by his "Nourjahad," a work which, did the success of operas depend entirely on music, would have succeeded thoroughly. But the "book" (the old story) was found dull, and though the music was voted beautiful and musician-like, the opera, as a whole, ceased to be performed. Not so individual pieces in it; a trio and at least one song—"There's a Light in her laughing Eye"—are still occasionally heard in the concert-room, and more often in the private circle. The presentation of Mr. Rooke's first and most successful opera, "Amelie," which had been waited for many years, was nearly adjourned sine die at last by a ludicrous incident. The opera, when accepted, partially rehearsed, and even advertised, was found to be not yet instrumented. The necessity for this operation had never occurred, till a band rehearsal had been called, to manager, musical director, or composer. After a most inopportune delay of several weeks, "Amelie" made its appearance, and kept possession of the scene for many successive nights. Some of the songs in it, "My Boyhood's Home" and "Under the Tree" (admirably sung by Mr. Manvers), are still in circulation, and maintain considerable favor.

Three dramatic composers, contemporaries, for some years at least, though we know not their comparative ages,—Thomas (Tom) Cooke, Alexander Lee, and Herbert Rodwell (a pupil of Bishop),—contributed each their quota to the stock of popular songs. The success of Cooke's "Love's Ritonella" claims especial notice from the fact of its having been made, not by a professed vocalist, but by an actor, Mr. Wallack, who rather said than sung it, and created a great sensation at the time by his intelligent, original, and effective delivery. Lee was the composer of many favorite songs,—of "Away, away to the Mountain's Brow," "Come, dwell with me," and "The Soldier's Tear"; and Rodwell (who from time to time just indicated the possession of powers which he never thoroughly put forth) exhibited unmistakable inventiveness in melody in "They mourn me dead in my Father's Halls," and "The Banks of the blue Moselle." He also set the songs in an adaptation of Mr. Harrison Ainsworth's Jack Sheppard; among others, "Nix my dolly, Pals," and "Jolly Nose," the approbation of which among the class best able to judge of them is said to have been unequivocal.

Charles Edward Horn, a dramatic singer as well as composer, made several successful hits, off as well as on the stage. Among the latter, "Cherry ripe," which first fell from the lips of Madame Vestris, in days "when all was young," has become a national melody; among the former, "I've been roaming," "The deep, deep Sea," and "Through the Wood" (the last two favorite songs of the lamented Malibran) have lost little of their former popularity.

A musician of great accomplishment,—a German by birth, but whom (like Handel and for like reasons) we have got to think of as one of ourselves, —Jules Benedict, is the composer of several English operas. The name of a song in one of them, "Rage, thou angry Storm," has come under our eye in concert programmes more than once very recently; while another, "By the sad Sea Waves," a rare example of refined and individual melody, must form part of every contemporary contralto's repertory.

Some of the successful productions, dramatic and other, of Vincent Wallace and George Macfarren, though more recent, are still sufficiently remote to claim a place in this article. Those of Mr. Wallace too, have, alas! come to an end. His talent was, perhaps, more happily exercised in the concerted piece than the solo,—especially the solo with its accompaniment reduced to drawing-room dimensions: for his instrumentation was very skilful. Like Mr. Wallace, Mr. Macfarren is a great master of combined effect, vocal and instrumental. As "the greater includes the less," he is the composer of many minor works which have found favor as well with the many as with the few.

Theatrical performance is for the musical composer the most efficient of all modes of advertisement; and that which is first heard within theatrical walls starts with advantages unattainable through any other mode of presentation. Nevertheless, some of the most popular as well as some of the best English songs of this century have altogether wanted the support of dramatic situation, and have owed their success to their intrinsic merit or their felicitous rendering in the concert-room. We have collected a large number of examples, to which it would no doubt be possible to add as many more. The difficulty in dealing with them is solely that of choice. Here are a few, in approximate chronological order.

The first that will come under our notice, from their number, popularity, and the length of time over which their publication was spread, are those connected with the name of Thomas Moore. We leave out of consideration all the collections entitled Irish Melodies, National Melodies, Evenings in Greece, &c., to which Mr. Moore contributed words, and Sir John Stevenson very indifferent, and Sir Henry Bishop very ingenious, "symphonies and accompaniments." Nor shall we stop to estimate the extent to which the majority of these National Melodies are in any sense "national," i. e. anonymous, ancient, or traditional in any nation; or how far Evenings in Greece were the results of "Evenings at home,"—home being very much to the west of the favored land "where grew the arts of war and peace." But Moore was the avowed composer as well as author of many favorite songs, and the unavowed composer (it is believed) of many more. He was an unlearned musician; and an unlearned musician can only exhibit invention, if he be gifted with it, in melody; hardly, even in melody (melopœia), but rather in tune, the rhythmical limits at least of which are of necessity very narrow and unelastic. Learned or unlearned, however, the composer of "Young Love once dwelt in an humble Shed," "My Heart and Lute," "The Woodpecker," "Those Evening Bells," and "Oft in the stilly Night," found a road to the hearts of his hearers which many a pundit has altogether mistaken, or been too clumsy to travel.

Two of Moore's countrymen, Augustine Wade and Samuel Lover (the latter only recently lost to the three arts he practised so gracefully), have been very successful song-writers: like Moore, too, setting their own verses. "Meet Me by Moonlight" and "Love was once a little Boy" are, after some forty years, still in circulation; and "The Angel's Whisper" (a more recent production, "running hard" some of the best of Moore's) will always find a sympathetic audience when rendered by a sympathetic voice.

A native of Wales, the late John Parry, — the father of our musical Gavarni, — is the composer of a song, "Jenny Jones," whose popularity was so great, and had been so long enjoyed, that about the year 1835, Mr. Charles Mathews introduced it in a dramatic piece, and sang it "in character," under the impression that it was a "national melody." Mr. Parry of course put forward, and easily established his claim to the parentage of "Jenny," whose unlooked-for turn in the wheel of Fortune was, it is to be hoped, advantageous to her progenitor. Mr. Parry was the composer too of a very pretty ballad, "Norah, the Pride of Kildare," which his son, before his specialty had been revealed to him, used to sing very sweetly.

Those amateurs whose recollections extend to forty years since will hardly have forgotten a novelty in musical publications of about that date, the employment of lithography (then a new art) in the decoration of music-titles. This fashion enjoyed but a short life, though a busy one. For a time it seemed as impossible for a song to come out, wanting a pictorial frontispiece, as for a gentleman to go out, wanting his hat and coat. Whatever the subject, — meeting or parting, absence or presence, morning or evening, plant or flower, soldier or saint, bird or beast, — there met you on the wrapper, he, she, or it; the creature, animate or inanimate, whose joys or sorrows, pleasures or pains, phases or sensations, you proposed to sing or hear sung about.

One of the first of these applications of pictorial art was to an aspiration. Not that the aspiration was depicted but the thing whose state of existence was aspired to. "I'd be a Butterfly," with a portrait of the ideal one, made its appearance one morning in Mr. Willis's shop-window (he occupied a portion of the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly), and in a few days half musical England — the better half — was smitten with an overpowering, resistless rage for metempsychosis. The success was astounding, and of course begat countless imitations, the majority of which attained only superficial successes. It was easier to imitate the wrapper of "I'd be a Butterfly" than the elegant verses and pretty tune inside it. These were the work of Mr. Haynes Bayly, whose future proved a long career of prosperity as a song-writer. Many of his subsequent productions equalled in popularity that just named, and one of them, "O no, we never mention her," probably exceeded it.

It must have been about this time, too, that another fashion in song-making sprung up, and, like the illustration fashion, flourished for a time vigorously, that of following a successful song by an "answer" to it, — a form of piracy against which the law of copyright furnished no protection. Thus "I'd be a Butterfly" was "answered" by "I'd be a Nightingale," or "I'd be an Antelope." Not only so, but the answer occasionally assumed the form of protest or contradiction; and a poet was not long wanting to assert that he'd "not be a butterfly born in a bower," &c., but something else. These trespasses on reclaimed ground were very numerous. Mr. Barnett's popular song, "Rise, gentle Moon," we remember to have been followed by "Rise, gentle Star"; and Mr. Bayly's "O no, we never mention her," by "O yes, we often mention her," — or him, as best suited the sex or taste of the singer. We do not recollect whether any answer was evoked by a very popular air, "We met"; if so it should have been, and no doubt was, "We cut."

Not a few of the popular songs of the first half of this century are the compositions of musicians highly distinguished in other branches of their art, and who, as it were, "awoke and found themselves famous" in this. Thus the admired Church composer, Thomas Attwood, made himself known to a still larger public by his setting of Campbell's "Soldier's Dream," his one successful essay in that direction. A single sacred song, too, from an oratorio by M. P. King, "Eve's Lamentation," became, and we believe still remains, a great favorite with sopranos of limited means.

Other popular songs, not many, have been the productions of musicians ("single-speech Hamiltons" of their art) whose existence one song only, and that a success, has revealed to the uninitiated. We remember nothing by the late Earl of Westmoreland which impinged on the public ear save the elegant but somewhat feeble "Bendemeer's Stream," which Mr. John Parry used to sing very often and very well, an advantage he also extended to "The Maid of Llangollen," an exceedingly pretty song, by a certain James Clark, by whom no other has come under our notice. Nor do we know of anything by Mrs. Philip Millard for an instant to be compared with "Alice Gray," one of those clear, individual melodies which, once heard, are learnt for life.

In or about the year 1831 the circle of resident musical composers was enlarged by the arrival in England of the Chevalier Sigismund Neukomm, an amateur, but an amateur who had been under professional training, and who could even boast of having been the pupil of Joseph Haydn. The Chevalier made his début here as a composer in "Napoleon's Midnight Review," a song which, notwithstanding some shortcomings, made an extraordinary sensation, and set every eye and ear on the watch for the next utterance of the composer. This was not long coming.

The Chevalier had the good fortune to find a coadjutor in the best and the most prolific of modern English song-writers, — Barry Cornwall. Their first joint effort was "The Sea." This attained a success which it would have been difficult to exceed and unreasonable to expect in another instance. It was sung by Mr. Henry Phillips, to whose feeling and intelligence — exercised on words so clear, yet so deep, so sweet, yet so strong — must the reception of the song be mainly attributed; for, to invert a common phrase, the music of "The Sea" is but a vehicle for the verse, being made up of commonplace passages, rather rollicking than spirited, which, however, it must be admitted, are pieced together with considerable skill.

The name of Barry Cornwall has reminded us of a curious circumstance connected with English popular songs, — the very small number even of the lyrics and lyrical passages — his not excepted — of the great poets of the first half of this century, which have been set to music with any signal success. How little is there "married to immortal" music of Wordsworth, of Coleridge, of Southey, of Keats, of Byron! Shelley is (strange to say) the principal exception: of Scott and Campbell, how few even of the verses written expressly for music have been happily and successfully set! Some attempts, more praiseworthy as attempts than as results, at musical illustration of Scott might be named, by Dr. Clarke Whitfield and Mazzinghi. But even Bishop, signalized by the author of Quentin Durward as the musician par excellence likely to "find the notes" of "County Guy," by no means came upon the right ones; and when he failed what could be expected of the mob who entered on the search with him? Who has "found the notes" to "Where shall the Lover rest?" When will the "Hebrew Melodies" cease to be a misnomer? With the exception of the songs by Attwood and of Dr. Callcott, of which we have already spoken, and one, "The Last Man," by a musician worthily bearing the last honored name, we can hardly call to mind a musical illustration of any of these poets which, even if successful at first, has held its own in public or private for any length of time.

We have characterized the best songs of the end of the last century as being "melodious, well fitted to the words, and becoming to the voice." The best songs of the end of the last half-century (with which this rapid survey must come to an end) are perhaps equally melodious, but not quite so tuney: their interest is not so exclusively centred in the voice-part. The majority of the former generally could be, and often were, performed without "the instrument," the duties of which were literally those of accompaniment. The instrumental part of a modern song is often so thoroughly interwoven with the vocal, that to pull them asunder would be to reduce a fabric to its raw material again. In this kind of song invention is perhaps less severely taxed — certainly the want of it is less easily detected — than in the composition of self-supporting tune. In that fitness to the words which consists in the adaptation of music generally conformable to them in spirit, our contemporaries will not suffer by comparison with their predecessors; in attention to the accent and quantity of each individual syllable they are decidedly inferior. Many of our most popular modern songs are sadly faulty in this particular. More than one instance might be given of songs by composers of repute falsely accented from beginning to end.

These for the most part, however, are opera songs, in the composition of which recent musicians have stood at a great disadvantage. The "poets" of Storace and his contemporaries were men like Sheridan, Cumberland, and M. G. Lewis, whose verses, if not always glowing with poetic fire, always had a thought in them grammatically expressed. Mr. Barnett and Mr. Balfe have had to set, and have succeeded in setting, to music emotions and situations; but the "poetry" with which they have had to deal could of itself have been no more suggestive of musical thought than the multiplication-table or Rameau's Gazette de Hollande. We cannot but think that the majority of modern songs are less "vocal" than those of the last age. This might have been expected. The prodigiously increased importance of instrumental music during the last three quarters of a century has naturally turned the attention of musical students to instruments "made with hands," somewhat to the neglect of that oldest and noblest of instruments, which is the work of a Divine Artificer: —

"For God made the 'chorus' and man made the 'band.'"

Whatever relation to one another the voice and to hold in the "music of the future," it should never be forgotten that, as a play is a thing to be played, so a song is a thing to be sung; and that what is to be sung must be singable, i. e. "becoming to the voice" of the singer, who otherwise can neither utter it with pleasure nor with effect.

HIS LITTLE WAYS.

NOTWITHSTANDING that, since the period at which I first accosted the reader in these pages, gray has something mingled with our younger brown, it may not be wholly without interest to the fairer portion of my friends to mention, incidentally, that I am still an unsuared being, a bright old bachelor, still faithful to my principles of freedom, still, with the combined decision and courtesy with which one honors, and repels, the efforts of a persevering foe, resisting eligible opportunities of parting with that blessing. Urbane, but inexorable, I really know no man who more thoroughly appreciates the charming qualities of the other sex, or cherishes a deeper sentiment of gratitude for the still greater blessings he had sometimes believed them not unwilling to confer. Cordially recognizing the sagacious provision that proposals should proceed from our side, I feel that I must else not only have long since exhausted all acknowledged forms of negative, but that the perpetual demand upon one's best, and tenderest sympathies must have seriously affected my nervous system, and terminated in — say sciatica, if nothing worse.

I would not, for worlds, be considered to speak disrespectfully of the married state. Very, very far from it. I have a positive predilection for matrimonial life, provided I do not share it, and look round upon the ever-increasing circle of its victims with something of that feeling, mournful, indeed, yet tender and humanizing, with which one gazes on the sick and wounded in some mighty hospital.

I have even a little gallery in my house, sacred to their manes. Under each sad-eyed portrait, with its forced, quivering smile, and, not unfrequently, that "tamed" look never seen in cage-born animals of the fiercer kind, appears the date of the unfortunate fellow's birth and exco—marriage, I mean — and I am sensible of few things more gratifying than to sit, smoking (poor lads! you never smoked) in your midst, to remember that if you fell easily, you bore it nobly, and to think that, but for a too ostentatious embracing of your chains, you might have passed for happy men.

One of you (Jes, Balaam Burkemyoung, b. 1687, m. 1715, you may well try to disarm me with that deprecating gaze), carried hypocrisy to the extent of marrying three wives! Of the first, history is mute. Between the last two, you lie buried. In the interesting bas-relief commemorating that circumstance, you are turning your back to the one, and bestowing your undivided attention on the other. Balaam, this is suggestive. Is it — can it be two to one that you were not a happy spouse?

Charley Wing, dear old boy, your wink is a transparent humbug. It is not worth one dump. That look, recalled with difficulty for deceitful ends, belongs to an earlier and happier period of your existence. You had been dead three years (to freedom) when, at the command of your sovereign, Mrs. Wing, you smirked for these effigies! My friend, I consecrate this sip of grog to the joy louder in praise of that blest condition than yourself. In the very act of exulting over a fallen brother, whil! your foot slipped, and you vanished over the dizzy precipice, with Sibyl Greatheed of the Grange.

John Adolphus Burkemyoung Parfitt (b. 1789, m. 1830), it is my painful duty to pass upon you the severest sentence in my power to award. Convicted on the clearest evidence, your marriage-certificate, of two offences of the highest class—treason, sir, and perjury—forgetful of your own voluntary vow that nothing should induce you to marry, you deserted the ranks of bachelorhood upon the merest provocation. Life's battle, sir, had hardly begun, when you, unhappy man, incited by one Agnes Heckstetter Williamson, of Scarborough, Yorkshire, Spinster, withdrew precipitately to the rear, and were heard of no more. You are hung, sir, well hung (light from the left), and may you be as happy as you don't deserve!

Philip Bamstead (b. 1800, m. much regretted, 1821), tender years recommend to mercy only when accompanied by the weakness and instability incident to youth. You fell in love, young sir, at seventeen. Four years were allotted you for reflection and repentance. In vain. On the day you came of age, you married. Human depravity—I cannot trust myself to speak. A baronet of my acquaintance, Sir Peter Teazle, has sagaciously remarked that certain marriages are crimes that bring their own punishment. You were a grandfather at forty!

And now, Tom Burkemyoung, the younger, "What shall I say to thee, Lord Scrope?" Friend of my youth, I knew thee, and that there was, in thy whole composition, not love enough to stir the soul of a flea. Had I been inquired of, by cynic, what man is safe? I should have unhesitatingly replied, "Tom. Tom Burkemyoung." To do you justice, however, you practised no deceit or perfidy. The woman does not breathe who shall taunt you with broken vows. Tom lost everything he possessed, and very considerably more, through the sudden dissolution of the Universal Starch and Stucco Company. Comprehending at one glance his position, Tom put himself up for sale. "My reserved price," avowed the frank, handsome fellow, "is two hundred thousand, fifty down." He was bought by Mrs. Curwig, widow of the eminent broker, the mark of whose honored head, against his favorite pillar in the Stock Exchange, is still pointed out to new-comers with pride and emotion. "Sic stabat Curwig" was to have been inscribed over the spot he had abandoned for another, where time-bargains are no more, but a brother magnate of the 'Change having declared that he, for one, would not "stab at" the memory of his old friend, the idea was prudently relinquished. Tom, old boy, health to you, and resignation. I salute you.

After all (this is first-rate "baccy"), after all, my suffering souls, I have not touched upon the worst of your condition. You remind me of the metamorphosed kings in Circe's palace. You were once men. You sank into husbands, from thence you degenerated into sires. In this moral decrepitude, you received the ironical title of "governor," your gubernatorial functions being, in many cases, expressly restricted to the forking out of cash.

Your case, my worthy things, is hopeless. Man's growing wisdom has greatly facilitated the cheaply and expeditiously getting rid of wives. But with your offspring the matter is different. The law of England, like a benevolent grandmother, adopts both parties, and, for a certain period, compels the satisfactory fulfilment of those functions you assumed with the honorary title above referred to.

Right you are, my excellent creatures, to adapt yourselves to uncontrollable circumstances; but the forced exultation under which you strive to conceal your disgrace is transparent to the (bachelor) friends who love you. Humbling it is to witness the first feeble efforts of some hero of fifty fields, to control the struggles of that formless dab of humanity he styles his "son!" Melancholy, indeed, is the spectacle of a man whose glowing pen has moved the social world, accosting his first-born as topsy-mopsy-wocums! It seems like a grotesque and horrible dream, begotten of German sausage and lager beer, that I once surprised an individual whose poems have been translated into sundry European tongues, entertaining his tyrant-baby with a lyric whose concluding lines are burned into my memory, to this effect:—

"Shim-sham paradiddle marabona ting-tang—Rigdum bulldidgm ky me."

Tears gather in my eyes as I pen these unforgotten words! I will pay one hundred pounds to any individual who will lessen the pang by proving to me that they are susceptible of any rational explanation. "Ky me" (whatever they may mean) if I will not!

Is it not enough that the dawning reason should be bewildered with such lights as these? Must it be wantonly misled? It is my belief that your baby begins to think reason long before its teachers condescend to talk it. My infantine common sense revolted, I remember, against the suggestion that I should hush-a-by on a tree-top, when not only was there a secure and comfortable nursery at hand, but a very serious mishap likely to ensue were the former proposition adopted.

Again: that "Burkemyoung" does not rhyme with "hunting" I hold to be an insufficient apology for addressing me as "bunting"; nor does the prospect of being wrapped up in a rabbit-skin offer sufficient attractions to atone for such unfaithful teaching.

Is it imagined that children are born without ears? An error. I knew a young lady who, at four years old, indignantly resisted the attempt in Jack and Jill, to reconcile "water" and "after," and always held to the improved transatlantic reading:—

"Jack fell down and broke his crown,
And, if Jill did n't—she oughter."

From these, among many examples of a similar nature, I am led to infer that there is something in the care of babies highly debilitating to the intellectual man. Consequently, to delegate the education of this, perhaps inevitable, nuisance, to the sex whose mental progress threatens to become unhealthfully rapid, may be the best for all parties.

I myself have studiously held aloof, and, with one fearful exception, recorded some while since in these pages, have never, that I wot of, been in direct communication with any baby living. It was, therefore, not without serious mental disturbance that I received a letter from my niece Mattie, married and residing abroad, referring to a rash promise on my part to come and see her first-born son, whenever that astonishing phenomenon should be revealed.

"Aware, dear," continued this saucy letter, "of your partiality for little trots, I have not been in a hurry to remind you of your promise; but, now, darling Babs is quite a little man" (he was about two and a half), "so come you must. I do assure you, uncle, he is not a common child," (if he had been, my curiosity would for once have been powerfully excited!) "He has a hooked nose, like papa, and the richest little barytone voice.

"His desire to see his godpapa is quite touching." (This remark merely proves into what extremes the naturally truthful mind may be betrayed by enthusiasm.) "The moment he heard you were expected" (So!) "he began saving up his bits of sugar, and would have been equally generous with regard to his magnesia, but that circumstances forbade! If you could only see him tearing his little cradle curtains — destructive darling, that he is!" (I could almost hear the kiss that accompanied this tribute.) "Or screaming and splashing in his little bath! O dear, dear! won't you be delighted with his little ways!"

Ha! Crumbs of comfort! My godson's ways were little. If ways of some sort be unavoidable, the smaller they run the better. A hooked nose, ha? I don't think I ever saw a Jewish baby; but, with infants of my own persuasion, the little dab of putty which represents the early stage of that organ simply expresses indecision as to the form it will eventually adopt. Let us, however, hope that the curved beak foreshadows greatness; at all events, that decision of character and self-control which (see Julius Cæsar, Arthur, Duke of Wellington, Sir Henry Morgan, the buccaneer, and others) qualify men to be successful leaders of men. As touching the quality of my godson's voice, that must, for the present remain a mystery, a shriek in barytone conveying to my mind no more distinct idea than that of a railway whistle with a cold.

My journey, as luck would have it, was made in company of an interesting young gentleman about my godson's years. There was something contraband, so to speak, in the manner in which he had been introduced into the carriage. At all events, it was only when we were fairly under way, and escape impossible, that he was suddenly born, as it were, from a basket that seemed to contain nothing but innocent lace, and announced his presence with a querulous squall that might have served for a signal to the next station. The pretty little mamma who, with a nurse, occupied the adjacent seats, apologized so sweetly for the — no doubt, to her — melodious disturbance, that I felt I could do no less than express myself as rather gratified, than otherwise, at the prospect of our journey being enlivened by such strains.

"You are fond of the pets, if I am not mistaken?" remarked my fair fellow-traveller, archly.

I bowed assent. "Pet" is a general term, and I have no aversion to a good bull-terrier.

"And I am sure," she added, more sweetly still, "they like you."

My heart stood still. A dew rose on my forehead. What if I were expected to caress the little abomination?

"How he fixes his pretty eyes upon you! It is quite curious how quickly they recognize their friends!"

If an intense desire to fling its object out of the window be indicative of friendship, I gave this infant credit for its penetration. Snatching the opportunity when mamma's eyes were for a moment averted, I returned the child's stare with a look that might have cowed a rhinoceros. But the result disappointed my expectations. The terrified howl I had elicited was interpreted as a desire to go to the kind gentleman who was smiling so amiably from the opposite seat. This, however, the infant, for its own private reasons, at once declined, thereby enabling me to display, with safety, an amount of disappointment that completely won the confidence of both mamma and nurse.

Upon the whole, this was a fortunate meeting. Here, I thought, was a splendid opportunity of learning a little baby-talk and general management which would prove invaluable in defence against my godson. Not to be tedious — before our little party separated, I had, by unwearying observation and a little judicious questioning, acquired all the needful rudiments of babiology. Although not qualified to maintain a fluent conversation, I felt that I could make myself generally understood. If incompetent to deal with unforeseen and critical incidents, I could answer for a certain self-possession in the presence of most. In cases demanding prompt action, I felt sure that my course, if somewhat rough, would be effectual. I knew which end of a baby commonly went first, and which had been agreed upon, by nursery sages, as more desirable to keep uppermost. I was aroused to the fact that "wagh!" (which I had hitherto imagined to be a phrase of the Sioux Indians) was babine for hungry: and "owgh!" implied a slight discomfort in the stomach: these being the only two incidents recognized in earlier baby life, as of any real consequence. The art of saying, "clk!" "chirrup!" and "boh!" at the aptest moment, was one that could not be imparted, but which tact, experience, and observation would soon supply. Finally, the rules that govern dandling and dancing are of so subtle a nature, that the inspiration of the moment is, upon the whole, the safest guide.

Armed with these timely hints, I lost all uneasiness, and by the time I reached my journey's end, was really almost as anxious to meet my godson as his doting mother could have desired.

"Now, uncle," said Mattie, composing herself, after the effusions of welcome, "how would you like to see him, first? Think, dear, and then say frankly. He does look so pretty, asleep! But, then, his little ways —"

"My dear," I said hurriedly, "if there be one condition in which a child affects me more pleasingly than another, it is in that sweet repose which must be so unspeakably grateful both to the innocent little being itself, and — and — to all that stand around."

"Come, then, dear. Hush-sh. Tiptoe, please! . . . There!"

Mattie was right. He was not a common child. I never saw so "made" a countenance in so very small a human being. Asleep in his cot, his face alone visible, he looked like a medallion of some ancient senator of Rome. His nose, commenced on the principle so much in vogue with that distinguished people, had been finished as a snub. There were purpose and determination in the close-shut lips, and a slight corrugation of the little brows, as if, even in dreams, the atom's thoughts were busy with schemes for the life that was scarcely begun.

"Calculating little beggar!" I thought, smiling, however, with all the sweetness I could command.

"He does n't take to strangers at all," whispered Mattie.

"Thank — no, really?" said I, much relieved. "But don't be uneasy, dear. He will to you," said Mattie, consolingly. "I do believe he's dreaming of you at this very moment!"

"Come, come, my dear!"

"Just hark." She put down her ear.

"Don't you see his little lips moving? 'Uncle.'"

"Bunkum, I fancied!"

"Nonsense,—only hark. 'Unky tum!'"

"Tum!"

"My own! Uncle is tum!" cried the doting mamma, and, in a burst of enthusiasm, she caught him up in her arms.

"Yee-ough!" yelled the child.

I rallied in desperate haste my lately acquired knowledge.

"Clk!" said I. "Catchee—that is to say, boh! How d'ye do? And heigh-diddle-diddle."

"Dear—he's beyond that," said Mattie, laughing merrily. "Kissy-wissy. Make friends. Talk, my own." And without a moment's hesitation, she placed him in my unaccustomed arms.

Rather to my surprise, the young gentleman offered no resistance, only making a clutch at a curl on my forehead, which (for reasons of my own) I evaded, compromising for the temporary misuse of my nose.

A little discouraged by the failure of my first conversational efforts, I now resolved to let my godson take the lead, and to adapt the stature of my observations to his. But, whether dumb with joy at his uncle's "tummying," or from some occult reason, not one word would he utter. Nevertheless, either the little animal was endowed with a histrionic genius far beyond his years, or he really was glad to see me. He smiled, after a grave, controlled fashion, and once executed a deliberate wink, as though to intimate that, when time and inclination should serve, we might have a good deal to say to one another. Presently he waxed fidgety, and, wrestling himself down, toddled to his cot, and returned, carrying in his small fists, something which he offered to my lips. Prudence dictating a previous examination, there revealed themselves certain substances, whose crumbly and attenuated character, pronounced them, past question, to be half-sucked lumps of sugar!

After this, our friendship ripened fast. He really was an engaging little man, and his odd fancy for his old uncle not a myth at all. Without any vast interchange of ideas, we arrived at a degree of harmony that I should not have imagined possible. Imitation is said to be the most delicate form of flattery, and my godson was never tired of copying my ways. Hence, his little ways, hitherto innocuous, became a source of considerable inconvenience, if not worse, and were attended with results quite other than what was intended.

Among the rest of my personal effects that had attracted the young gentleman's notice, perhaps the most beloved was a brightly decorated Turkish pipe, cut, as I had been at some trouble to explain, from a jasmine tree, a very, very, very long way off! This latter circumstance appeared to give Babs, as he was usually called, some disturbance.

One day the pipe was missing. Great tumult and inquiry. Babs silent and meditative. Next morning the pipe had returned to its accustomed haunt. Eagerly charging it, I began to inhale the fragrant fumes, when—Pheugh! Whish! Psish! An earwig! Psha! Another! Two! Twenty! Out they came in batches, scampering in every direction! Babs, the secret being too much for his little bosom, burst into tears, and avowed that he had connived at the pipe's passing the night in the heart of a jasmine bush. "It was such a very, very long way from home." Babs evidently has a vague idea that the night had been one of festival and welcome for the distant cousin from the Levant!

Growing (as my hair-dresser has for thirty years assured me) a little thin on the top of my head, I had, of late, adopted a few supplementary locks, and these, in the intimacy of friendship, I did not hesitate to dress in the presence of Babs. One day I missed both Babs and hair, and proceeding, in some agitation, to the nursery, surprised my young friend busily engaged, with his mother's scissors, in removing the very last curls from Isidor's masterpiece.

"Dessing 'oor hair!" cried Babs, triumphantly, waving the denuded scalp before my horror-stricken eyes. He had wished to save me trouble.

My godson was in the habit of paying me early visits in my room. Now, I confess to one unjustifiable propensity, that of smoking in bed; but not conceiving it necessary, at present, to warn my visitor against so evil an example, I puffed away tranquilly, as though he were not there. I shall never forget one terrible morning, when, roused by violent screams and shouts of "Fire!" from the upper story, I dashed up stairs, through a stifling cloud of smoke, to find, happily, poor Babs already rescued, and descending, wrapped in a wet blanket, into the arms of his agonized friends. He had been trying to smoke in bed, but, novice as he was, and embarrassed with the bedclothes, the result had been limited to fire!

These little misadventures, which, in fact, were only so many proofs of love and confidence, only served to cement our alliance, and my visit was drawing to a most successful close, when coming down one morning, rather late, to breakfast (for I had felt a little indisposed) my niece received me with an exclamation of horror.

"My dear uncle, what ever is the matter? Why good heavens! dear, you are green!"

"Literally, or figuratively?"

"Don't laugh, dear? Look, Harry." And she burst into tears.

My nephew looked at me gravely, and rang the bell.

"Whether you like it or not, my dear uncle, I shall send for our neighbor, Dr. Courtney. The doctor—instantly," he added, to the servant who answered his summons.

In the mean time, I had ascertained that my countenance, throat, and, in fact as far as I could see, had assumed the color of a green caterpillar, accidentally boiled.

Dr. Courtney was with us, almost before I had completed my self-examination. After a moment, he drew me apart.

"Do you want the truth?"

"My dear sir, what else?"

"You've been poisoned!"

My heart certainly gave a throb.

"What have you been swallowing?"

"Nothing but what, I am grieved to say, every one else has partaken of."

The physician shook his head, as in doubt of that.

"Pray go to your room, and to bed. I will be with you again, within a quarter of an hour. Meanwhile, endeavor, I beg of you, to remember everything you have recently taken."

Feeling myself becoming seriously ill, I obeyed his directions, in all but the last. I could not, however, remember having partaken of anything my friends had not.

Dr. Courtney quickly returned, and administered such counter-agents as he deemed best.

"I don't conceal from you," he said, "that I am groping somewhat in the dark. The nature of the poisonous matter you have swallowed is not revealed by the symptoms with sufficient accuracy. But we will do our best. You are no worse, I find."

"I—I don't know," said I, faintly. "I think I could sleep a little."

"You shall. But, first, take this."

This was something of so nauseous a character, that I begged for something to remove the flavor.

"Bit o' crockydile!" sobbed Babs, who was crying by the door. "I fetch it."

"No, no, my love," cried Mattie, entering at the moment, "that would make poor unky worse. It's poison."

"I eat good bit, whole tail!" cried Babs, exultingly.

Mattie uttered a wild shriek, and caught him in her arms. But at that instant, the nurse entered with the crocodile in question. It was an effigy, in chalk and sugar, of that interesting saurian. The doctor caught it from her, and applied his tongue.

"There's no harm, here, my dear lady," he remarked.

"See, he has licked off all the green, which is a deadly poison," gasped the mother.

"No, I did n't!" shouted Babs; "I scrape off pitty green, for unky, and put it in his beer!"

"Hurrah!" exclaimed Dr. Courtney. "Then I see my way! All has been done rightly, so far. I know the composition of this filth, and will gage my right hand that we cancel its effects."

We did so, under Providence, and this was the last time I had to complain of my godson's "little ways."

THE QUEER CUSTOMER.

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

[Concluded.]

THE last words referred to the turkey, which was under Miss Pinnifer's especial care, and which she forthwith began to baste violently.

"I've had a good deal of attention in my time, you see, my dear, so perhaps I think the less of it on that account. It isn't to be expected, you know, with my experience, that I should be dazzled by a Mr. Brown. Is n't he fat, dear?"

"Is he?" said Milly; "I have n't seen him, you know."

"Not seen him!" said Miss Pinnifer. "What do you mean? My dear, I was speaking of the turkey."

"Oh!" said Milly.

The conversation was interrupted by the return of the party from church. The younger Todds were found considerably in the way of the cookery, till Milly hit on the happy expedient of sending them to the baker's to fetch the pig. Forthwith they departed, with pig written plainly on their countenances, and raced all the way to the shop, upon the understanding that the tail should be the prize of the winner. Johnny, the eldest, as might have been expected, came in foremost, to the great grief and discouragement of his brothers, till he magnanimously promised them that they should have the tail after he had done with it. Rather more quietly than they had set out, the trio returned from the baker's, Johnny and Tommy Todd carrying the dish between them. Willy, the youngest, much wanted to carry the cover, but the more mature wisdom of Johnny suggested that perhaps the pig would keep hotter with it on; so Willy had to content himself with walking behind as near as possible, and sniffing the fragrance of the savory burden. When they reached home, Mr. Brown had just arrived, and their father and Milly were endeavoring adequately to express their appreciation of the hampers. Mr. Brown seemed pleased by the interruption, and patting the boys' heads paternally, asked them if they were good boys. Johnny and Tommy, though a little abashed, answered manfully (with a view to sixpences) that they were, but Willy, who was of a nervous temperament, began to cry, and promised irrelevantly that he would n't do it again.

Dinner-time speedily arrived, much to the satisfaction of everybody. A few minutes before the appointed hour came a young gentleman with a very stiff shirt collar, and a rather bashful expression of countenance, whom Milly's blushes at once designated as Charley Collins. Almost before Charley had been formally introduced, Miss Pinnifer came upon the scene, dressed in the black satin spencer, and pink muslin skirt, with little blue bows pinned on all over her, and leading by the hand a solemn-looking individual, whom she introduced in a tragedy tone as "My brother." The individual thus alluded to did not trouble himself to salute the company, but dropped into the first chair in his way, and fixed his eyes with a strong glare upon Mr. Brown. The party arranged themselves round the table, and began to do full justice to the good cheer. For some time there was but little conversation, everybody being too busily employed to talk when suddenly Miss Pinnifer's brother paused in the very act of conveying a large piece of turkey to his mouth, and pointing with his fork, and the morsel still on it, at Mr. Brown, said "Halloa!" Mr. Brown looked a little uncomfortable when, Miss Pinnifer hastened to explain,—"You'll excuse my brother sir, he's of unsound mind." And then leaning over two of the little Todds, and seizing her brother by the collar of his coat, she shook him violently, and said in an impressive voice, "Robert, behave!" Whereupon Robert became much depressed, and "behaved" accordingly. After the excitement caused by this little incident had subsided, the dinner proceeded with great smoothness, and the little party, which at first had felt some little constraint, was rapidly unbending under the genial influence of the Christmas cheer. At last came the crowning glory, in the shape of the pudding. And such a pudding! It was the very largest-sized pudding within the memory of the oldest inhabitant: so big, indeed, that Milly could n't bring it in herself, but had to ask Charley Collins to help her. And rich! I should rather think it was! It was a regular millionaire of a pudding. Miss Pinnifer's brother again created a little confusion by insisting on eating pepper with it, and shedding tears when the cruet was taken away from him; but when at last he was prevailed upon to try it without seasoning, he sent up his plate three times from which I infer that he was by no means such an idiot as was generally supposed. At last the dinner came to an end—as dinners will, the more 's the pity—and the party drew round the fire in a cosey semi-circle, and set to work regularly to enjoy themselves. The kettle was put on the fire, the spirits and lemons and sugar were brought out, and Mr. Brown volunteered to brew some punch (which he did as though punch had been his daily drink from his youth up), and then, when everybody was served, the pipes and tobacco were brought out, and Mr. Brown called upon John Todd for a song. And John sang a song, and another, and another after that, to the most tremendous applause, even the blackbird dropping his critical airs for once and applauding as loudly as anybody. And then Mr. Brown sang a song; after which Charley Collins sang a song, with a remarkable chorus, which was sung by the whole strength of the company with such good-will that the people next door could n't hear themselves talk, and knocked at the wall with the poker as a gentle hint for peace and quietness. And Milly herself sang a song, and then Miss Pinnifer's brother murmured something which was understood to mean that he also would favor the company; but being asked the name of the song, he replied, after much consideration, "More pudding." So to make up for his shortcomings Miss Pinnifer volunteered, and after repeating five times that she had a cold (which was n't true) and that she had n't a note in her voice (which was), she began, with intense expression, "Will you love me then as now?" The direction of her glances made it quite a personal matter between herself and Mr. Brown, who should by every rule of propriety have sung in reply, "Dearest, then I'll love thee more." But he did n't. Probably he did n't know the song, or, still more probably, he would n't have sung it if he knew it!

As a slight protection against the too oppressive glances of Miss Pinnifer, Mr. Brown entered into conversation with Charley Collins, who had by this time got rid of his bashfulness, and appeared, as he really was, a light-hearted, manly young fellow. Charley had conceived a great liking to Mr. Brown, and was very confidential with him; so that Mr. Brown was speedily made aware that his young friend was a clerk at the moderate salary of eighteen shillings a week; that he had had an offer of a situation where he could earn two pounds, but that security to the amount of three hundred pounds was required, which put it out of the question. Charley Collins could not help a half-sigh as he stated what might be, and yet could not be, and Mr. Brown could easily understand that the situation so temptingly offered, only to be perforce refused, was just enough to give Milly and her lover the start in life for which they were waiting.

The merriment by no means flagged as the evening wore on. Mr. Brown was the life and soul of the party, cracked jokes, asked riddles, told stories, kissed Milly and Miss Pinnifer under the mistletoe, and generally proved himself the prince of good fellows. Forfeits were played, and blind man's buff, at which latter game Miss Pinnifer gave rise to grave suspicions as to her fair play by persistently refusing to catch anybody but Mr. Brown, and holding him an unnecessarily long time when caught. After blind man's buff, a dance was proposed, and carried out with great success, John Todd performing on the violin. Miss Pinnifer's brother had been rather gloomy during the previous amusements, but he now began to enjoy himself immensely, dancing away by himself in the very middle of the room with a funereal expression of countenance, and occasionally tumbling over one or other of the young Todds, who had rather indefinite notions of dancing, and were a good deal in the way. But he did n't mind, not he; he picked himself up and went at it again as if nothing had happened. One by one the dancers stopped, exhausted; and at last the fiddle stopped, too; but Miss Pinnifer's brother still continued to dance, without a smile on his countenance, and without any apparent intention of ever leaving off. Indeed, I think it highly probable that he would have continued dancing to this moment, had not his sister by certain whispered blandishments, in which the word "pudding" was plainly audible, persuaded him to leave off, and finally got him to bed.

The youthful Todds about this time began to show signs of weariness, and were with some difficulty induced to retire to rest, Johnny Todd with the inestimable pig's tail under his pillow. The remainder of the party gathered round the fire, and chatted quietly. Mr. Brown seemed to have suddenly grown silent since the children's departure. At last after a pause in the conversation, he said suddenly — "Mr. Todd — I've a proposition to make to you. Don't go, Miss Milly — what I'm going to say concerns you too. This lady and gentleman are friends of the family, and I don't mind speaking before them. Mr. Todd, I'm not a young man — I've been knocked about a good deal in my time, and I mean, if I can, to have a little comfort in my old years. So I'm looking out for a wife, and I have n't seen any young lady so much to my liking as Miss Milly there."

At this startling announcement Milly turned red and pale by turns, Charley Collins clenched his fists, and looked unutterable things; and Miss Pinnifer became perfectly rigid, with only energy enough to turn up her eyes to the ceiling, and to murmur in heartbroken accents, "Cruel — ker-revel man!"

John Todd attempted to speak, but Mr. Brown continued, —

"Hear me out, please; and then give me what answer you like. I'm not a young man, as I said before, but I'm easy-going, and I believe I should make a good husband. I've worked hard in my time, but I've made twenty thousand pounds, and now I don't intend to work any more, but just to enjoy myself. My wife will have a good time of it, mind you. Balls, concerts, parties, if she likes 'em, she shall have 'em, and that's all about it. Now, Miss Milly, what do you say? Will you be an old man's darling?"

"Mr. Brown," John Todd began, but Milly interrupted.

"No, father, let me speak. Mr. Brown, I thank you for your offer, and I don't doubt it's kindly meant. But I've given my heart away already (as you might have guessed to-night), and I can't give it twice."

"I know, I know," said Mr. Brown, sadly. "But it's weary waiting, Milly, all through the long years, and a boy-and-girl fancy soon dies away."

"Ours is n't a boy-and-girl fancy, then, Mr. Brown, for I'm quite sure it'll never die away. Never, never, never! Will it, Charley?" Charley did not trust himself to speak, but a warm pressure of the hand answered Milly well enough.

"Don't decide in a hurry, Miss Milly. There are many things to think about, you know; your father, now. He ought n't to work as he does, at his time of life, and his eyes are failing already. Now, if you'll marry me, your father shall have a good house over his head, a nice little cottage in some quiet country place, and need never do a stitch of work again. And the boys shall have good schooling and a fair start in business. It's worth thinking of, my dear."

Poor Milly felt utterly miserable. She had not the smallest idea of wavering, but Mr. Brown had artfully contrived that by being faithful to her true love, she should appear to deprive her father and brothers of a host of blessings, all of which it was in her power to bestow. She could only sob out—

"It's very cruel," and burst into tears.

John Todd had made repeated efforts to speak, but now he broke out in a tone that bore down all interruption,—

"Mr. Brown, for the kindness we've received from you, I'm obliged; and I don't go from it. But I'm not obliged, sir, by your coming into my house, and trying to steal away my daughter's affections from a young man as truly loves her. It ain't fair, it ain't manly, it ain't honorable. And when you go and try to work upon her feelings along of her old father, that she'd give her right hand for, it's mean and cruel and cowardly, that's what it is. And I tell you what, sir,—I would n't take another kindness at your hands, no, not if I was starving. I'm a creaky old man, sir, I know I am; and my sight's failing, as you say; but I've work in me yet, thank God, and I'll work my fingers to the bone before I'll bid a child of mine marry for money without love."

"And perhaps you'll let me say a word, Mr. Brown," interposed Charley Collins. "It ain't much, it's only a matter of opinion, and it'll relieve my mind. It's my opinion, sir, that you're a canting, two-faced, hypocritical old humbug!"

"I'll trouble you to say that over again presently, young man," said Mr. Brown, who seemed to recover his cheerfulness under abuse. "It might be useful, if I wanted a character, you know. Well, Mr. Todd, then that's your answer, is it?"

"It is so, sir," said John Todd, with great decision.

"And yours, Miss Milly?"

Milly's reply was of a rather remarkable description. She quietly turned round to Charley Collins, and put her arms round his neck.

"And yours, Miss Pinnifer. I beg pardon, I quite forgot I had n't asked you a question."

Miss Pinnifer looked as if she wished he had.

"Well," said Mr. Brown, "after all, perhaps it's just as well as it is; and I've had the satisfaction of making my own acquaintance from a totally new point of view. I really had no idea I was such a very unpleasant person. Let me see now. I'm mean, and I'm cruel, and I'm cowardly. That's Mr. Todd's idea. Mr. Collins says I'm a hypocritical, canting, double-faced—dear me, what was it he topped up with?"

"Humbug," said Charley, boldly.

"Old humbug," corrected Mr. Brown, sternly. "I'm not going to let you off any of the adjectives, my young friend. You, Miss Milly, were of opinion that I was a wretch."

"I did n't say so," said Milly.

"No, my dear, but you thought so, and that's much the same. Dear, dear! if your poor mother had only lived to hear her brother Tom called all these horrid names, 'pon my word I believe she'd have boxed your ears all round."

"Uncle Tom!" exclaimed Milly.

"You're never Tom Hawkins!" cried Mr. Todd.

"Yes, sometimes," said the stranger, meekly; "generally, I may say. Allow me to introduce myself, ladies and gentlemen: Thomas Brown Hawkins, at your service. As for my character, I'm a mean, cowardly, cruel—a regular tragedy uncle, in fact."

"My dear uncle," said Milly, "of course we did n't know. And you were only in joke, after all."

"Well, my dear, I'm not so sure of that; but a man may n't marry his grandmother, you know; and I rather think there's a similar foolish prejudice as regards nieces. So, on the whole, perhaps it's just as well you did n't say yes."

"I'm sure I heartily beg your pardon, brother-in-law," said Mr. Todd. "You won't bear malice for words said under a mistake, I'm sure."

"Well, I'm not quite certain whether I will or I won't," said Mr. Hawkins. "I should like to punch that young rascal's head for calling me an old humbug, but I'm afraid I should get the worst of it."

"I'm very sorry, sir," began Charley.

"No, you're not, my dear boy; or if you are, you need n't be," said Mr. Hawkins. "It was an old man's joke, and I rather think I saw the fun of it better than you did."

"But I had always heard you were dead, Hawkins," said Mr. Todd. "Many a time my poor wife used to talk and cry over her only brother, who was thought to have been drowned at sea."

"I ought to have been, by rights," said Uncle Tom. "I've been in three shipwrecks, but I was preserved, probably for a higher and drier fate. I've been a digger, and a storekeeper, and a good many other things besides. I'll tell you all my adventures, one of these days. And now I've made as much as I care to make. Yes, that twenty thousand pounds is a fact, Miss Milly, and I've come to England to enjoy myself with my nephews and nieces. So you won't marry me, eh?"

Milly shook her head saucily.

"Well, then, as I've set my heart on a wedding, I suppose you must marry somebody else. I think I know somebody who'll find that security, Mr. Charley, though you did call me a canting old humbug. No thanks!—don't like 'em; always makes me feel as if I was being tickled and was n't allowed to laugh. Milly, little woman, if you're very good, you and I will take a run out of town the very first fine day, and see if we can't find that same cottage we were talking about,—small garden in front, and the name of John Todd on the door, you know."

In spite of Uncle Tom's objection to thanks there was a simultaneous outburst of grateful joy,—the overflow of happy hearts. John Todd squeezed his brother-in-law's left hand, while Charley Collins violently shook his right, and Milly, with both arms round his neck, kissed him repeatedly. Miss Pinnifer wept so violently that her small pocket-handkerchief looked as if it had been recently washed, and not recently dried.

The excitement rather increased than diminished in intensity, and Uncle Tom was in a fair way to be literally smothered with caresses, when the door suddenly opened, and Miss Pinnifer's brother, in a white and peculiarly airy costume, stalked into the room. The unfortunate man had waked from his first sleep with an uneasy sense that the promised pudding, with the hope of which he had been beguiled to rest, had not been duly furnished; and he had therefore risen at once, without the formality of dressing himself, to claim his due. There was an exclamation of astonishment followed by a shout of inextinguishable laughter, and then Miss Pinnifer, with much presence of mind, seized the table-cover, and hurriedly draping it round the intruder, marched him back to bed.

For a little while longer the little party sat around the fire, talking of the hard times past, and the pleasant times to come: and hearing the story of the tempest-tossed life, come to an anchor at last. And then the time for "good by" came, and as with loving kisses and hearty hand-shakes, they said "good night," the chimes from a neighboring church tower rang out midnight, and Christmas-day was over. And Uncle Tom, reverently doffing his hat, said, —

"Thank God for a merry Christmas."

"Amen!" said Charley Collins.

"Amen!" said John Todd, "with all our hearts, amen!"

* * * * *

Thank God for Christmas! So say we all, and God help him who cannot say Amen! For peace and good-will, for the quickened pulse of charity, for quarrels reconciled, and love renewed, the golden gifts of Christmas, God be thanked. Thanked, not alone with our lips, but with our hands and our hearts, by spreading these golden gifts, that others may thank him too. None is so poor but that, once a year at least, he may be a "rich uncle" to somebody; none so joyless but that he may catch a reflected ray of happiness, by doing something, be it ever so little, to make merry Christmas in the heart of another.

THE MILLER'S DAUGHTER.

A STORY.

NOT far from Canterbury, at a place called Trompington, there lived a miller, named Dannis Simekin.

He was a man who boasted, year after year, that he was so much heavier and so much stronger.

At first sight and word he was a hail-fellow-well-met man, but after a little time, the stranger discovered how small a soul and how mean a mind wandered about in the big body that was so boastful.

He had been churchwarden and overseer of the poor for fifteen years, when Elizabeth, his daughter, was eighteen years of age, — and then he was forty.

Could any man bring any charge of dishonesty against the miller? No. Did any man in the parish think him a bad, grasping, an unscrupulous man? All. He belonged to that weary set of men who are neither good, nor kind, nor pleasant, and yet on the surface appear to be frank, straightforward, and hearty. These men are the very shadow and hypocrisy of good citizens.

As an overseer, he kept the laborers' cottages few and far between, so that not too many should gain settlements, and he subscribed to the fund for giving certain laborers enough bread in the winter months to save them from dying, and enable them to live on to do farm-work through the rest of the year, so that wages might not go up.

In a slow, foolish way, he found that it was cheaper in the end to give as little bread as possible in the winter, than to turn off the laborers who had not gained a parochial settlement.

He had the appearance of being charitable, while in fact he was balancing his many profits and few losses.

The profits, however, were not very great or numerous, because he preferred to be almost sure in a small petty way, rather than be the least venturesome in a greater.

As for lasses — Dannis the miller never had been charged with light conduct with the lasses when he was young. He rather misdoubted girls, and never kissed until he married Miss Haughton, from the big house.

When the church was restored the miller put in a cheap window of stained glass, Faith, Hope, and Charity being the subject, and this he bought cheaply, owing to an advertisement he saw in one of the papers.

So much for his heart and mind. This is how the miller looked. A tall man, over six feet high, with broad open chest, and wide swinging arms, a head well set upon his shoulders, and his brown hair hanging well about his head. A healthy, wholesome look he had, but nothing tender about him, except his voice, which was at times artificially low. The eyes shifted and glinted, the mouth was very heavy, and moved in lines which were rounded and pleasant, but these lines changed, made, and unmade themselves so slowly that they became odious. However, the features most to be mistrusted in that face were the nostrils. They were neither still nor dilating — the latter generally proving a candid, honest man. They quivered.

He walked erect, and none went to church or gave out the responses so roundly as he, — his wife and daughter following suit.

So am I brought to his wife, who was an offshoot from the great house, — Apton Court.

Great families must have poor relations when great estates go wholly to the eldest. This Miss Haughton was the daughter of a second cousin. She was housekeeper at Apton Court when the miller saw her for the first time at the village church. Although he was the tallest man in the parish, and she was the tallest woman, yet much against common custom they selected each other.

He was very civil to her, abject indeed as a lover, because she was the cousin of Sir Allen Haughton, of Apton Court, and she never attempted to induce him to become more familiar.

He obtained not one penny with her, but he thought perhaps he should get the new lease on more advantageous terms if he married a cousin of his landlord's house. It was a vain hope. Sir Allen was glad to be rid of a poor relation who resented any interference with her duties, and the woman herself was only too happy to be free of her dependence, which she could not brook. Thus both married for interest, with no love between them, and no advantage to be gained by their wedding. Nevertheless, they were blessed with a child, at whose coming they wondered.

The miller and his wife faced the world well, and met their neighbors handsomely, but they never had anything to say to each other, rarely spoke to each other before third parties, and when at home they conversed upon business.

If they quarrelled they kept it to themselves, for they were machines in life, and required no sympathy. They found their own lubricating oil, which took the shape of their consciences.

In this home, which prospered yearly, a daughter was brought up. The daughter cared as sincerely for father as for mother, and for neither much.

Mrs. Simekin diligently followed the fashions set by the ladies of the hall, and exacted a word from them on Sundays in the churchyard after the morning service was over.

So this family grew up until the girl was seventeen.

By the time that the daughter was seventeen, the miller had added another trade to that of wheat-grinding. He was partner in a loan-office concern, which thrived upon the wants of others more easily than did the mill upon the honest people who sent their wheat to be turned into flour.

Said the miller to his London partner, "By my faith, Isaiah, if thus we go on, shall I not be a rich man! And I know not why my daughter shall not marry a gentleman, as her mother was born a lady, and so make of me a gentleman. I lays I'll not die without writing 'squire after my name. Nay, my wife knows of a house on the other side of the valley, that is a gentleman's seat, and shall be mine if I can make it so. 'T would be rare to have Sir Allen on one side of the valley, and his cousin, Dannis Simekin, Esquire, on the other, for I would have you to know that by marriage I 'se the cousin of Sir Allen Houghton, of Apton Court."

It was about the time when the daughter Lisbeth was fifteen years of age that rare news came to the miller, that Sir Allen's son — young Sir Allen, as the common people felicitously called him — had applied to the office to obtain money upon the chances of outliving his father and coming into the estate.

"Never a word let him know, Barker, that I 'm in the concern, and let him have as much as he likes upon his good security. It 's bank safe, and we shall make a haul; old Sir Allen cannot live many years, as I know from my wife, who had it from the hall herself, and I 've my plan, sir, my plan."

Never had the miller seen young Sir Allen since he had become a man. At sixteen the heir had quarrelled with his father, and not once since had he shown himself in the neighborhood.

He was in the army, it was said, and he was allowed two hundred a year. This was all the miller's neighborhood knew of the heir of the owner of all the land in the parish.

As the next three years went on, the miller and his wife walked more fiercely upright than ever, and it was noticed that she spoke almost insolently to the Lady Houghton, — a weak woman, who was quietly dropping into the grave from sheer grief at the loss of her son, whom her husband had forbidden her to see.

The miller and his wife walked more proudly than ever, because they looked upon the land to be as good as theirs.

They had their plan.

Month after month, year after year, money at ruinous interest was advanced to young Sir Allen, so that all the miller's money was absorbed, and he himself had borrowed upon the securities he held, and upon the lease of his mill, that he might still more deeply involve young Sir Allen.

So far they had never met.

By this time Lisbeth, the daughter, was of age to marry.

She was a fine, bold-looking girl, not coy, reserved, or graceful; given to riding audaciously, dressing in the extreme of fashion, and knocking off a quick valse or a galop at the piano, with more effect than truth.

Her face was round, her features sensuous and frank, her mouth somewhat large, and her gray eyes gleaming.

One day, at Canterbrigg, she being in the saddle, a cavalry officer said to a comrade, "A fine animal."

"Which," asked the other, "the horse or the woman?"

Her only female companions were those ladies who hunted, and these she knew only in the field. They would cut her in a shop.

She laughed, for the miller and his wife had let the daughter into their plans.

She was frank and outspoken with the sons of the higher-class farmers, and she would ride by their side by the mile, — nay, she had even been known to take a cigar with one or two of them; but she never visited their sisters, and they never visited at the miller's.

In fact, the miller and his wife were about the most desolate people in Trompington. Nobody cared to visit them. The squire and the rector called sometimes, but they never stopped, and even Lisbeth's school companions, after one dose of a week at the mill, found they had had quite enough of it, and made promises to come again, which very heartily they never meant to fulfil.

But the miller and his wife, and their daughter, walked proudly to church, and they knew what the future would bring them.

The daughter belonged to no society of young ladies, taught in no schools, looked after no poor, and did no household work.

Sometimes the miller's wife, when in high good-humor with her daughter, would address her as "my lady," a process at which the mother and daughter would laugh, when mayhap the miller coming in he would laugh too, and the family would be quite merry, — for a moment.

"Lass," says the miller one day to his wife, "young Sir Allen and his regiment are come to Canterbrigg, and it is now time to try his mettle."

That day the miller wrote a letter to his London partner, and two days after an answer was returned.

"Wife," said the miller, "he will be here to-morrow with a friend. Let there be everything right, and do you, Lisbeth" (this to his daughter), "do thy best to be handsome and agreeable."

The next day, in the afternoon, two gentlemen arrived on horseback. They were received at the mill with all the honors, the miller, his wife, and daughter standing on the door-step to welcome them. The miller was dressed in his Sunday clothes, a white cravat about his neck, while his lady was arrayed in crimson silk, and golden ornaments to match. Lisbeth was resplendent in a low pink moire dress overdone with lace flouncings and rich ruchings, and you could see her fine shape and her fair skin. Of her bright brown hair she had made the most, and had twined in it some large lustrous beads, which were in perfect accordance with her style of beauty.

The two visitors were of similar stature and build, and possibly they might have passed for brothers; but while one was distinguished and refined in look, the other appeared much like the ordinary cavalry officer, ready for enjoyment, and not too particular as to how it was obtained.

They came unaccompanied, and rode equally good horses. They dismounted together, and neither man looked after the other.

The miller, his wife, and daughter, to whom Sir

Allen's son was perfectly unknown, looked with equal smiles upon both gentlemen, until the less distinguished of the two men said, —

"Simekin, let me introduce you to my friend, Captain Clark, — Jack, this is the miller."

The captain bowed, but the family, having now ascertained which was "young Sir Allen," had already almost forgotten the captain's existence.

"We hope you've come to stay, Mr. Allen," said the miller's wife; "for though I know we can't do things as they can do them up at the hall, still I have some silver, and you'll see the family arms on it, — for, as you know, I am a second cousin of yours."

"Yes, to be sure," said the young squire. "I had forgotten it. Have you been quite well all these years?"

"Very well, Sir Allen — I mean Mr. Allen, but as you must be Sir Allen some day, it does not matter if my tongue made a slip. This is my daughter, Lisbeth, Sir Allen — I mean Mr. Allen, and this is my husband, and right glad heartily am I to welcome you here, though I wish it was at Apton Court itself."

By this time she had led the way into the mill drawing-room, a flashy state-chamber, in which old and honest furniture, old drinking-horns and hunting-horns were mixed up with a blazing carpet, a crashing tri-chord piano, and yellow, blue, red, and green paper dahlias on an amber-colored mantelpiece.

"Of course," continued the miller's wife, to whom the miller resigned the conversation, "of course you have come to stay, Mr. Allen, for nobody shall know of it up at the hall, though if they do I don't see that it can hurt you, Mr. Allen, — which may I ask if ever you hear from Sir Allen?"

"No," replied Mr. Allen, "my father and I are still at variance. Would you have known me again, Mrs. Simekin, had you met me without any knowledge of who I was?"

"In a moment," she replied.

"And yet you have not seen me since I was a boy of sixteen."

"Oh! there is something in the face of our family. Mr. Allen, that can always be recognized. Do you not notice it in my Lisbeth's face? — Lisbeth, come here."

During the last few moments the young heir's friend had been talking with Lisbeth, and this is what passed. The captain spoke first.

"This is a very charming place, Miss Simekin."

"Yes, — I am generally called Miss Lisbeth. Mamma and I object much to the name Simekin."

"Indeed, — I am sorry to have pained you."

"Not at all. Have you known Allen long?"

"We have been fellow-officers for some years."

"Is he engaged?"

"Engaged?"

"Yes, — engaged to be married. How stupid you are!"

"And you are very candid, my dear Miss Lisbeth. No, I don't think my friend is engaged."

"Is he a good sort of fellow? Don't look astounded, man. You know one always wants to know the best and the worst. What is he like?"

"Mr. Allen Haughton is to a certain extent a gentleman."

"But there's no nonsense about him, — is there?"

"Not that I know of. But we as seldom know our friends as we know ourselves."

"O, but you're very close, you know!"

At this point her mother called to her, and she left the captain without any word of apology on withdrawal.

"There," continued the miller's wife, "can't you see your own face in my Lisbeth's? — I can. Lisbeth, you need not be shy, for this gentleman is your cousin."

"I am not shy, mamma, and I'm sure I shall get on capitally with Cousin Allen, — sha' n't I, Cousin Allen?"

"It will not be my fault if you don't," said Allen with a laugh, and a freedom of talk and expression which had been totally wanting in his friend.

"You're going to stop, Mr. Allen?" urged the miller's wife, — "you don't go away to-day?"

"We must return to Canterbrigg to-night, cousin," said the young squire, "for we have only a twelve-hours leave, — but a visit will be for another time."

Here the miller's wife turned away, leaving Mr. Allen and Lisbeth talking together; and going up to her husband she whispered, "Get the other one out of the room. He's in the way of our young people."

"Captain," said the miller, with an insolent freedom of tone which was very strong in contrast with that he had adopted towards the young squire, — "Captain, have you ever seen a mill?"

"No, miller, I have never seen a mill."

"Come and take stock of mine then, — it will only cost a coat-dusting. Mother, when will dinner be ready?"

"In half an hour, miller," she said, imperiously.

"Come along, Captain," said Dannis, and he led the way, the officer following gravely.

Scarcely had they left the house when the miller said, "How does he go on?"

"Who?"

"The young squire!"

"He is very well."

"Is he raketty?"

"I scarcely follow your meaning, miller."

"Does he look much at the pink bonnets?"

"I really don't know, — I think not."

"Does he bet much now?"

"No, — not much, I believe."

"Then where does his money go to?"

"I have no knowledge where his money goes to."

"You know he spends heaps o' money, don't you?"

"No; I never knew that."

"As 'stravagant a young dog as ever trotted. But there, we was all young once."

"No, miller, some of us are never young."

"Faith," laughed the miller, "we all of us grow old."

"True; but many of us have young hearts at eighty."

"I don't know what 'ee mean, Captain, by young hearts."

"So much the worse for you, miller."

The miller looked at the captain as though he could not quite understand him, but he had always felt a contempt for a smaller man than himself who had never proved that he was not afraid of him, and therefore he did not respect the captain; for what was a captain compared with the miller of Trompington, who was so rich that he held post-obits upon half the land in the parish, and whose daughter would be Lady Haughton?

"Captain," said he, basing his attempt upon the plea which he had found answer nine times out of ten throughout his insolent ruffling life,—"Captain, dost ever want a fifty now and then?"

"A fifty?"

"A fifty-pound note," explained the miller, telling himself comfortably that this captain was the greatest fool he ever had met.

"Yes," replied the officer coolly, "I have sometimes wanted a fifty-pound note, and then generally got it."

"Ha, ha!" laughed the miller, in self-triumph; "a joke, dang me, a good joke. Well now,—I a'most wish you wanted a fifty now, for I think I could let you have it, and never say a word about it."

"Ha! then you want me to do something!"

The miller smote his own leg, and then his guest's, and said, "Why, lad, I was thinking thee a fool, and thou art not."

"Thank you, miller," said the captain; "but what have I to do for it?"

"Get young Mr. Allen to stop here to-night. We can get him a medical 'stificat to set him straight with the colonel. And tell him to look after his cousin, for she is a fine girl, and his own blood, and a richer than you (for one) would think."

"Allen is clever enough, miller, to see for himself."

"But you can help him to see."

"I hardly can tell how."

"Try. I suppose he doesn't let you into his secrets?"

"Generally I know quite as much of his secrets as Mr. Allen does himself."

"Then he's told you about the post-obits, as the lawyers call 'em?"

"Yes."

"I know'd you was chaffing me. Lor, what a couple they'll make, and me living up at the court, and the missus too, so that the county'll have to come down to us, after all, and them big-wig parsons at Canterbrigg have to be civil—ha! it'll be a good time,—and the mill leased out to one who shall know his place."

Here the miller spruced himself, and pulled down his waistcoat.

"There be nothing like a English yeoman," he said.

"Except the father-in-law of a baronet," said Captain John, very gravely.

The miller saw a vast joke in this reply, and slapped his guest's leg and his own once more.

"Dinner be ready,—there goes the bell!"

"Ha, miller, have you a dinner-bell?"

"Thee see they have it up at the great house, and so my madame said, as she belonged to Apton Court, she would have a dinner-bell; neither do I see why it should not be so!"

"You young people go together," said the miller's wife, addressing her daughter and Allen,—
"for I see you understand one another."

Captain Jack ate very little, and once or twice Mr. Allen burst into laughter, apparently with his friend for the butt. The miller and his daughter followed suit, and the miller's wife smiled. As a cousin of the great house she rarely laughed.

"Do 'ee eat," urged the miller to Mr. Allen, who was heartily feeding, "thee don't eat a bit, Allen."

The miller took no notice of the captain, who was making a sufficiently temperate meal.

"Do 'ee drink, Cousin Allen," urged the miller,

"for thee art drinking nothing. I'll open another bottle o' 'fiz.'"

"Our champagne, cousin," said the miller's wife, "is excellent. We are very careful with our wines."

This was a point at which Mr. Allen looked at Captain Jack, and broke into a huge roar of laughter.

Even the grave captain smiled.

"He be a fool, though, thought the miller, looking at the quiet military man.

"Mr. Allen, have some of this ham," urged the miller's wife.

"She cured it herself," said the miller.

"Mr. Simekin," she immediately replied, "there is no need to trouble my cousin with particulars of this character."

Five minutes afterwards the cry was,—

"Mr. Allen, do have some of that puddun; our Lisbeth made it."

Upon this occasion the miller was not rebuked by his smiling wife, who said,—

"Do try it, Cousin Allen; for our Lisbeth, though a lady, is able to be domestic."

[The pastry in question had come out in the confectioner's cart from Canterbrigg.]

At last that twenty-pound lump of cheese which usually finishes an insolent dinner came upon the table.

Pressed to eat of the cheese, Mr. Allen cheerily said, "O yes,—lots of cheese, Cousin Simekin. In for a penny in for a pound."

Quite conformably with the manners up at Apton Court, the miller's wife rose and led the way out, followed by her daughter, leaving the three men face to face.

The port was on the table,—the miller's time had come. His guests were lighting cigars,—he had taken to a long pipe.

"Mr. Allen, your friend says as he knows all."

"All, miller,—for I suppose we are coming to business."

"With thee leave, Mr. Allen. Did it come on thee with a start when thee heard 't was I was thee creditor?"

"Not much. I knew that the money had been had,—and it was owing to some one. You're the man. So much the better for you."

"Can thee pay it back?"

"Not I."

"If Sir Allen died could thee pay it back?"

"That would depend. Sir Allen for twenty years has not spent one fourth of his income, therefore if he left me his personal, as he must leave me his real estate, I could readily pay off the post-obits."

"Hey,—but will he leave 'ee the cash?"

"No,—I think not!"

At this point Captain John, who was but slightly interested in this conversation, and who was looking about, saw a door move which led into a side room.

The miller's wife and daughter were listening.

"Cousin Allen," continued the miller, "I'll speak to thee plain,—art engaged to be married?"

"I believe I am," with a laugh; "but what of that?"

"Can thee get out of it?"

"What, the promise?"

"Yes,—can thee send her to the right-a-bout?"

"Any man could do such a thing,—few would."

"I'll garrant thee from the lawyers,—I will, if thee'll take thy cousin Lisbeth, and thee shalt have every one o' thy sinnatures back, and not owe me a farden, and I'll 'lowance thee twice what Sir Allen do."

For a moment there was silence, and then Mr. Allen with a great laugh said, —

"Captain Jack, what say you?"

"Hey," cried the miller, "Captain Jack will say yes, as sure as there's fifty sovereigns to a fifty-pound note, or a hundred sovereigns to five twenty-pound notes, — won't thee, Captain?"

"O yes," said the Captain. "You must marry some one, Allen, and it must n't be a poor wife. Why not marry your cousin Lisbeth?"

"Brayvo," said the miller, striking his thigh.

Mr. Allen laughed, took a swig at the wine before him, and said, "But I must get out of my engagement first."

"Never mind her," urged the farmer. "Think of thy cousin, Allen, who is pretty enow, and likelier enow."

When Mrs. Simekin sent to let them know some tea was waiting for them, the miller whispered to the captain as they went out of the room, —

"That hundred is thine, Captain, — but I did na' say when I would pay it. Thou shalt have it when they are man and wife."

"I am much obliged," said the captain.

An hour afterwards the miller had taken the captain to try his billiard-table, and the miller's wife finding something to do, Mr. Allen and Lisbeth were left alone.

"So you are engaged," she said, suddenly.

"Why, how do you know that?"

"You told papa so, — and he told me!"

"Told you, Lisbeth?"

"Yes, — for I knew all about it."

"About what?"

"Why, the plan to marry us two."

"And would you have me?"

"Yes."

"Upon so short an acquaintance?"

"Yes."

"But you know that I am engaged."

"You can't marry us both, Cousin Allen, and I dare say I'm richer than she is."

"She has no money whatever."

"Then of course you couldn't marry her."

"It could be done."

"And you would be wretched forever. If now you choose me — you would be rich at once."

"No — for I should still owe your father the money."

She laughed.

"I'd see fair-play, — he shouldn't claim a farthing. No — if you marry me for my money I'd see you had it. Fair-play's a jewel."

She laughed again.

In the next hour much was said, — things not pleasant to put upon record, because they were heartless. He was unscrupulous enough, and her tone of mind and behavior made him worse.

"I'll manage it," she said, "and dad will never trouble you for the loans."

At this point the miller appeared, and, simulating annoyance, told Mr. Allen that his horse and his friend's had got loose and were in the wood, out of which to drive them they might want a couple of hours.

"I'll send a boy on a cart-horse if thee like to bar-racks, explaining how 'tis."

"It matters very little," replied Mr. Allen; "we will excuse ourselves, my friend and I, when we reach garrison."

An hour afterwards, Lisbeth herself was helping to saddle her horse. She was eloping to secure Allen, first, from the danger of being discovered by his father, secondly that she might at a blow overcome her rival.

The miller, his wife, and daughter, were quite in collusion as far as the elopement went.

A quarter of an hour after the miller's two saddle-horses had quitted the mill-stables, carrying off Mr. Allen and Lisbeth, the miller, moving nervously up and down the house, leaving his guest to amuse himself as best he could, the miller sees a paper on the ground.

He picks it up, looks at it, starts, and then runs off to his strong-box. For a moment he rages, then his anger changes to laughing admiration.

"Wife!" he cries, "wife!" And as she comes bustling into the room, he says, "Our girl, — what a chip of the old block she be! She have stole — that be, taken — all the deeds signed by Master Allen. Her's a clever woman. Her was 'fraid that I would na' keep my word, and she's stole a march on me. Faith — she's our daughter."

The miller's wife smiled, but said nothing, for she was thinking of the vengeance she was about to have. For twenty long years, — during which her freedom had lasted, freedom from the thrall of her family's head, — for twenty years she had nurtured her hatred of the fancied humiliations she had endured. Truth to tell, she had but suffered the grievance of being poor. And her revenge took this form. She sent one of her women-servants up to the hall upon some message, with instructions to tell one of the hall-servants as a secret that the young master had been visiting at the mill, and had eloped with the miller's daughter.

She knew the news would soon reach my lady's ears, and that then Sir Allen would know all.

She hugged herself with the thought of the agony the baronet would experience. So this hapless husband and wife made merry with each other, and forgot the existence of quiet Captain John, whom they found one hour afterwards, quietly reading an old chance book he had found in the incongruous mill drawing-room.

"Will 'ee have anything, Captain?"

"No, thank you, miller. What time is it?"

"It be near ten."

"What time do you go to bed?"

"Ten."

"Don't let me keep you up. I'm ready for bed when you are. Are the horses caught?"

"Yes, Captain. Will 'ee have any supper?"

"No, miller. What time do you get up in the morning?"

"Five."

"I'll be up with you."

"But we does n't breakfast till seven."

"Never mind breakfast. I shall be in Cantebrige to breakfast."

"As thee like, Captain," said the wretched curmudgeon, who saw no use in being civil and hospitable to the captain now he was useless, now the end held in view was gained. Not a word said he about the hundred pounds.

Here the mill-house bell rang, and the wife's face lighted up with a cruel light.

"It's Sir Allen," she said.

She rose and went to the door, so that she met the baronet as he came into the hall.

He was very pale.

"Good evening, Cousin Sir Allen," the woman said, — "though what we owe this late visit to, I am unawares."

"My son is here, — was here!"

"Your son, Sir Allen?"

"Yes; he who has completed his crimes by eloping with your miserable daughter."

"Your son!" cried the wretched woman. "Is he your son?"

"So I hear, woman, — you must know the truth."

"She does not," here said a quiet voice, which the miller's wife recognized as that of the neglected captain.

"ALLEN!" cried the baronet.

"Good evening, Sir Allen," said the captain, gravely coming forward. "I heard my name mentioned, or I would not have interfered."

"My son, Allen," murmured the baronet.

The miller and his wife were looking murderously at each other.

"Your son, Allen," replied the captain.

After a few moments, Sir Allen said, —

"Very recently I have heard that your extravagance had a good intention; is that so?"

"I have never, Sir Allen, exceeded your allowance, and I have been rather looked down on in the regiment consequently. I have raised large sums of money by means of post-obits, but not for my own necessities. My sister, your daughter, in consequence of whose marriage to a poor man, with my connivance, you quarrelled sir, with me, — my sister informed me that her husband had inherited a large extent of mortgaged estates. I obtained the money you have heard about to release that property. I have but one creditor, the miller here."

"What of his daughter?"

"The miller thought he was bribing me to marry his daughter to save me from ruin. My friend, once fellow-student, and now brother-officer, Jack Clark, personated me, while I contented myself with assuming his name. He has eloped with the miller's daughter. I shall never marry below my station, Sir Allen, or without your consent!"

The baronet raised his arms, his lips trembled, and he was about to utter some gentle words, when, recalled to himself by the presence of the miserable miller, and his still more miserable wife, he said, —

"Come home, son, we have much to say one to the other."

"Friend miller," said the true Mr. Allen, "you are not so clever as you think."

Thereupon the father and son left the miller and his wife still staring hatefully at each other.

They remained, and remain, a rare proud couple. They boast of their daughter, the captain's wife; but she never comes to see them, and they never go to see her.

The inhabitants of Trompington have never understood the elopement, but they have heard that when the miller and his wife are bitter one with the other, that she says, —

"It was your blood in her — boor!"

And he replies, —

"It was yours, my fine madam."

The miller and his wife hate each other.

He sometimes looks down into the mill-pond, and wonders how long a man will take drowning.

But wilfully he will never drown.

The miller's wife wonders to what age she shall live.

And their daughter never comes to see them.

And they never go to see their daughter.

They had not, when young, cast their bread upon the waters, and after many years the ocean of their life is barren.

If to those who have loved much, much shall be forgiven, as writes gentle St. Luke, how unpardonable is the stretch of unforgiveness which surrounds the streaming, waning sight of those who have never loved at all!

Forgive — us — our — trespass —

But here is the end of the page.

VOICES.

FAR before the eyes or the mouth or the habitual gesture, as a revelation of character, is the quality of the voice and the manner of using it. It is the first thing that strikes us in a new acquaintance, and it is one of the most unerring tests of breeding and education. There are voices which have a certain truthful ring about them, — a certain something, unforced and spontaneous, that no training can give. Training can do much in the way of making a voice, but it can never compass more than a bad imitation of this quality; for the very fact of its being an imitation, however accurate, betrays itself like rouge on a woman's cheeks, or a wig, or dyed hair. On the other hand, there are voices which have the jar of falsehood in every tone, and that are as full of warning as the croak of the raven or the hiss of the serpent. There are in general the naturally hard voices, which make themselves caressing, thinking by that to appear sympathetic; but the fundamental quality strikes through the overlay, and a person must be very dull indeed who cannot detect the pretence in that slow, drawling, would-be affectionate voice, with its harsh undertone and sharp accent whenever it forgets itself. But, without being false or hypocritical, there are voices which puzzle as well as disappoint us, because so entirely inharmonious with the appearance of the speaker. For instance, there is that thin treble squeak we sometimes hear from the mouth of a well-grown portly man, when we expected the fine rolling utterance which would have been in unison with his outward seeming; and, on the other side of the scale, where we looked for a shrill head voice or a tender musical cadence, we get that hoarse chest voice with which young and pretty girls sometimes startle us. In fact, it is one of the characteristics of the modern girl of a certain type; just as the habitual use of slang is characteristic of her, or that peculiar rounding of the elbows and turning out of the wrists which are gestures that, like the chest voice, instinctively belong to men only, and have to be learnt and practised by women.

Nothing betrays so much as the voice, save perhaps the eyes, and they can be lowered, and so far their expression hidden. In moments of emotion no skill can hide the fact of disturbed feeling, though a strong will and the habit of self-control can steady the voice when else it would be failing and tremulous. But not the strongest will, nor the largest amount of self-control, can keep it natural as well as steady. It is deadened, veiled, compressed, like a wild creature tightly bound and unnaturally still. One feels that it is done by an effort, and that if the strain were relaxed for a moment the wild creature would burst loose in rage or despair, and the voice would break out into the scream of passion or quiver away into the falter of pathos. And this very effort is as eloquent as if there had been no holding down at all, and the voice had been left to its own impulse unchecked.

Again, in fun and humor, is it not the voice that is expressive even more than the face? The twinkle of the eye, the hollow in the under lip, the dimples about the mouth, the play of the eyebrow, are all aids certainly; but the voice! The mellow tone that comes into the utterance of one man, the surprised accents of another, the fatuous simplicity of a third, the philosophical acquiescence of a fourth when relating the most outrageous impossibilities, — a voice and manner peculiarly transatlantic, and indeed one of the Yankee forms of fun, — do not we know all these varieties by heart? have we not veteran actors whose main point lies in one or other of these varieties? and what would be the drollest anecdote if told in a voice which had neither play nor significance? Pathos too, — who feels it, however beautifully expressed so far as words may go, if uttered in a dead and wooden voice without sympathy? But the poorest attempts at pathos will strike home to the heart if given tenderly and harmoniously. And just as certain popular airs of mean association can be made into church music by slow time and stately modulation, so can dead-level literature be lifted into passion or softened into sentiment by the voice alone.

We all know the effect, irritating or soothing, which certain voices have over us; and we have all experienced that strange impulse of attraction or repulsion which comes from the sound of the voice alone. And generally, if not absolutely always, the impulse is a true one, and any modification which increased knowledge may produce is never quite satisfactory.

Certain voices grate on our nerves and set our teeth on edge; and others are just as calming as these are irritating, quieting us like a composing draught, and setting vague images of beauty and pleasantness afloat in our brains. A good voice, calm in tone and musical in quality, is one of the essentials for a physician; the "bedside voice," which is nothing if it is not sympathetic by constitution. Not false, not made up, not sickly, but tender in itself, of a rather low pitch, well modulated, and distinctly harmonious in its notes, it is the very opposite of the orator's voice, which is artificial in its management and a made voice. Whatever its original quality may be, the orator's voice bears the unmistakable stamp of art and becomes artificiality; as such it may be admirable, — telling in a crowd, impressive in an address, — but overwhelming and chilling at home, partly because it is always conscious and never self-forgetting. An orator's voice, with its careful intonation and accurate accent, would be as much out of place by a sick-bed as court trains and brocaded silk for the nurse. There are certain men who do a good deal by a hearty, jovial, fox-hunting kind of voice, — a voice a little thrown up for all that it is a chest voice, — a voice with a certain undefined rollick and devil-may-care sound in it, and eloquent of a large volume of vitality and physical health. That, too, is a good property for a medical man. It gives the sick a certain flip, and reminds them pleasantly of health and vigor; it may have a mesmeric kind of effect on them, — who knows? — and induce in them something of its own state, provided it is not overpowering. But a voice of this kind has a tendency to become insolent in its assertion of vigor, swaggering and boisterous; and then it is too much for invalided nerves, just as mountain winds or sea breezes would be too much, and the scent of flowers or a hayfield oppressive. The clerical voice, again, is a class voice; that neat, careful, precise voice, neither wholly made nor yet quite natural; a voice which never strikes one as hearty or as having a really genuine utterance, but which yet is not unpleasant if one does not require too much spontaneity. The clerical voice, with its mixture of familiarity and oratory, as that of one used to talk to old women in private and to hold forth to a congregation in public, is as distinct in its own way as the mathematician's handwriting: and any one can pick out blindfold his man from a knot of talkers, without waiting to see the square-cut collar and close white tie. The legal voice is different again; but this is rather a variety of the orator's than a distinct species, — a variety standing midway between that and the clerical, and affording more scope than either.

The voice is much more indicative of the state of the mind than many people know of or allow. One of the first symptoms of failing brain power is in the indistinct or confused utterance; no idiot has a clear or melodious voice; the harsh scream of mania is proverbial; and no person of prompt and decisive thought was ever known to hesitate or to stutter. A thick, loose, fluffy voice, too, does not belong to the crisp character of mind which does the best active work; and when we meet with a keen-witted man who draws, and lets his words drip instead of bringing them out in the sharp incisive way that would be natural to him, we may be sure there is a flaw somewhere, and that he is not what the Americans call "clear grit" and "whole-souled" all through. We all have our company voices, as we all have our company manners, and we get to know the company voices of our friends after a time and to understand them as we understand their best dresses and state service.

The person whose voice absolutely refuses to put itself into company tone startles us as much as if he came to a state dinner in a shooting-jacket. This is a different thing from the insincere and flattering voice, which is never laid aside while it has its object to gain, and which affects to be one thing when it means another. The company voice is only a little bit of finery, quite in its place if not carried into the home, where, however, silly men and women think they can impose on their house-mates by assumptions which cannot stand the test of domestic ease. The lover's voice is of course sui generis; but there is another kind of voice which one hears sometimes that is quite as enchanting, — the rich, full, melodious voice which irresistibly suggests sunshine and flowers, and heavy bunches of purple grapes, and a wealth of physical beauty at all four corners. Such a voice is Alboni's; such a voice we can conceive Anacreon's to have been; with less lusciousness and more stateliness, such a voice was Walter Savage Landor's. His was not an English voice; it was too rich and accurate; and yet it was clear and apparently thoroughly unstudied. Ars celare artem, perhaps; there was no greater treat of its kind than to hear Landor read Milton or Homer. Though one of the essentials of a good voice is its clearness, there are certain lisps and catches which are very pretty, though never dignified; but most of them are exceedingly painful to the ear. It is the same with accents. A dash of brogue, the faintest suspicion of the Scotch twang, even a very little American accent, — but very little, like red pepper to be sparingly used, as indeed we may say with the others, — gives a certain piquancy to the voice. So does a Continental accent generally, few of us being able to distinguish the French accent from the German, the Polish from the Italian, or the Russian from the Spanish, but lumping them all together as a "foreign accent" broadly. Of all the European voices the French is perhaps the most unpleasant in its quality, and the Italian the most delightful. The Italian voice is a song in itself, not the sing-song voice of an English parish schoolboy, but an unnoted bit of harmony.

The French voice is thin, apt to become wiry and metallic; a head voice for the most part, and eminently unsympathetic; a nervous, irritable voice, that seems more fit for complaint than for love-making; and yet how laughing, how bewitching it can make itself! — never with the Italian roundness, but câlinant in its own half-pettish way, provoking, enticing, arousing. There are some voices that send you to sleep, and others that stir you up; and the French voice is of the latter kind when setting itself to do mischief and work its own will. Of all the differences lying between Calais and Dover, perhaps nothing strikes the traveller more than the difference in the national voice and manner of speech. The sharp, high-pitched, stridulous voice of the French, with its clear accent and neat intonation, is exchanged for the loose fluffy utterance of England, where clear enunciation is considered pedantic; where brave men cultivate a drawl, and pretty women a deep chest voice; where well-educated people think it no shame to run all their words into each other, and to let consonants and vowels drip out like so many drops of water, with not much more distinction between them; and where no one knows how to educate his organ artistically, without going into artificiality and affectation. And yet the cultivation of the voice is an art, and ought to be made as much a matter of education as a good carriage or a legible handwriting. We teach our children to sing, but we never teach them to speak, beyond correcting a glaring piece of mispronunciation or so; in consequence of which we have all sorts of odd voices among us, — short yelping voices like dogs, purring voices like cats, croakings, and lisplings, and quackings, and chatterings; a very menagerie, in fact, to be heard in a room ten feet square, where a little rational cultivation would have reduced the whole of that vocal chaos to order and harmony, and made what is now painful and distasteful beautiful and seductive.

UNDER THE FIRS.

"BETTER, decidedly," said our doctor. "You'll be all right in a day or two."

"Thank goodness!" said I.

"I want a rubber of whist," said our doctor, smiling. "so I shall put you to rights as soon as possible. — Down, Hec.! — I say, Scribe," he continued, patting the head of his great dog, "I ought to apologize; and I would, if I had brought him up; but he slipped in unseen."

"By the way," said I, "how did you get that animal?"

"Patient of mine — death-bed legacy — thereby hangs a tale. — But, my good sir, what are you scrabbling that note-book from under your pillow for?"

"To take notes, to be sure," I said; "tales are scarce in the market."

"Did n't I say that you were to stop all work for the present?" was the severe apostrophe.

I fell back with a groan.

"Stop a few days, and I'll tell you all about it — that is, if you will condescend to get well first under my treatment."

"I'll do my best," I said; and I really did: so that, a week after, my friend the doctor was sitting with me, ready to relate the promised tale, while I was all attention.

"I had a patient down in Surrey some time since," he said, "with a complaint that regularly baffled me. He was a bailiff, or something of that sort, living entirely alone as to human society; but he had for companion that great white dog — now mine, you know. Well, I attended him for weeks; and then one day I said to him, 'Now, frankly, it's a regular robbery for me to keep on coming here when I can do you no good. The long and the short of it is, medicine won't touch you, — your mind's diseased. You have something upon it. Now, what is it?'

"The poor fellow was silent for a few minutes, and then rising upon his elbow, his pale, drawn face all wild and scared of aspect, he caught me by the arm, whispering, 'How did you find it out?'

"By your manner," I replied; 'and, depend upon it, you would be all the better if you relieved your brain of the stress.'

"Master," he said, with a wild look, 'it's that dog'; and he pointed to the great animal.

"That dog?"

"Yes, and something else. He knows it all, and I'm afraid of him; but, before I go, I'll tell you all about it."

"He seemed to be struggling for some moments with a great emotion, and then fixing his eyes on mine, he began, pointing as he spoke towards the dog, —

"I tried to kill him again and again, sir, but I could n't, and I'm sorry now that I ever tried, for he was always a good and a faithful beast. — Come here, Hec.!"; and the great dog came up to the bedside, and licked his master's thin white hand. 'I'd ask you to forgive me, Hec., old fellow, but you are only a dog, and would not understand me; but though I'm a man, and you're but a dumb beast, I'd be glad to change places with you this moment. — You know, sir, when my wife went away, and she was supposed to have gone to her father and mother?'

"I nodded.

"Well, sir, it was not my poor wife, but her sister, who had been staying with us, whom I saw into the train that morning, at Hindley Station; and it was directly I reached home that a tiny spark, that had been pricking and tingling in my heart for months past, suddenly burst out into a fierce flame, — so fierce that I could not quench it, — and I did a deed that no one ever suspected. I need not go into all that now, but I had had little suspicions for long enough, — suspicions that I know now to have been false; while, when I returned that day, I fancied something more, and angrily accused her. I don't even know now myself how it happened, more than that she retorted fiercely, and ran up stairs, where I followed her; and then, more words passing, I struck her brutally with my fist, — a cruel, cowardly blow, — and with a loud cry, she pitched backwards from top to bottom of the stairs; and then, after the heavy, dull crash with which she fell, all was quite silent, for I stood still listening, till old Hector there burst into a low, whimpering howl.

"Then, all trembling, I went down slowly to find her lying in the little passage, quite motionless, with the dog licking her face; while, when I drove him away and spoke to her, she did not answer. Then I went down upon one knee to alter her position, for she was lying, stunned as I thought, with one arm bent under her, and her head turned in a strange, awkward way. I trembled violently, for though I thought her only stunned, with possibly an arm broken, all the time there was a dull, horrible, black dread coming up like a cloud to cover my soul, though as yet I could not understand what it meant.

"I shuddered, though, as I moved her, for her head hung back horribly, while, when I fetched a chair-cushion to rest it upon, her neck seemed to give way too easily. But I saw the next moment that her arm was broken; and laying it in what I thought to be an easy position, I fetched water, and began to bathe her face and temples, stopping once to threaten the dog, who kept on howling in the kitchen.

"Being a bailiff, ours is a lonely place, and there was no one near, or I should have called in help; for, as time passed on, and she did not revive, the strange black feeling seemed to grow thicker and more dense, though I would not give way to it as yet. I tried salts, brandy, burned feathers, chafing her cold hands, every remedy that I could think of, persevering for quite an hour; when all at once the black cloud seemed to cover me, and I jumped up, trembling worse than ever, for I knew that she was dead, — that I had murdered her!

"I've suffered since, sir, every torment and pang that can come from a man's conscience, — such stings as I could hardly have thought a human being could bear, and not go mad; but they have all been as nothing, compared to the horrible feeling that came over me when I first knew the dreadful truth. First knew it! I had known it all along, from the moment after I struck the blow; but there was something within me that kept beating it off till now, when it came upon me like blasting lightning.

"At first, it was a frightful feeling of remorse and sorrow, and I would have given my own life to have brought her back, as I threw myself down by her side, calling her by name, begging her to forgive me, and kissing the face that was fast growing colder and colder. Then came a sense of fear, and I shrank back, scarcely daring to be near her, and glad at last to lay my handkerchief over her face; while that soon changed to a cowardly feeling of dread, — not of her, nor even of future punishment for my unthought-of deed, but for the present, and the time when it would be found out.

"For a few moments my head swam, and I nearly fell, while thoughts crowded into my head of the police, the handcuffs, the prison, the judge, and, last of all, of the gallows. What could I do? How could I hide the deed? Could I not say that she had fallen from top to bottom of the stairs, and would not that have been sufficient? Quite, I thought; and putting on my hat, I was about to run off to the town for a doctor, when I recollected that it was more than two hours since she had fallen, and that she was growing cold; while as soon as the medical man began to question me, I knew that I should betray myself.

"I dared not go; I dared not stir from the house; I dared not stay; and in my dread I got the dog close to me, and struck him when he looked in my face and howled. At least a dozen times I went and looked at the body lying there, so horribly still, but, in its very silence, speaking to me in a tongue, ignorant man that I was, that I could readily comprehend. But now a profound feeling of selfishness had taken possession of me, and I was pondering as to how I should conceal the deed. I had been a great reader, living so much in a quiet retired part, and I tried to recall whether I had ever read of any man being in a similar position to my own, fixing at last upon Eugene Aram.

"Whenever the dread seemed greater than I could bear, I kept telling myself that I had never meant to do the deed; and having spirits in the house, I drank, — drank deeply, but without producing the effect I wished.

"Towards evening, first one and then another person came to the cottage, and as I heard their steps I trembled; for it seemed to me that some one was coming to ask me the question: Where is your wife? But no: I faced them one by one, — the baker, the woman who brought us yeast and milk, and a hawking gypsy.

"I saw you and your missus at the station this morning, sir," said the woman who left the yeast. "Is she goin' to stay away long?"

"Yes," I said; "for some time"; and my heart gave a great leap, as these words suggested to me that other people might have made the same mistake, and it would be generally supposed that she had left home on a visit.

"But about the body, — what should I do with it? I tried to think what I should do; but now there came a fresh struggle, — a new horror to contend with. Something was urging me; voices seemed whispering to me, guiding me to the place where I kept my guns, and then, trembling in every limb, I loaded one, — two barrels, — and sat down thinking for a while. It seemed the best thing I could do; but I rose to take one more look at her as she lay in the passage so cold and still. I laid down my gun, and crossed the room, but for a long time I could not remove my handkerchief from her face, while, when I did, it was but for a moment, and I dropped it again shuddering. Then I seemed to have heard voices outside, and I ran out, and looked up and down the lane, and round the house, but I was alone; and once more I entered, closed the door, and took up my gun.

"But I dared not: I was a coward, and I feared to meet the future. I wanted to live on and repent; to try and make amends, if it were possible; and thus I waited hour after hour, — hour after hour, always haunted by the dread of voices which seemed whispering round me. Twice I thought she called, and I started and answered trembling, going each time as far as the passage, to come back shaking like a leaf, after touching the hand, by this time cold as marble.

"I had put the gun back in its corner, merely keeping the ramrod in my hand, with which from time to time I struck the dog to keep him quiet, for the poor beast would go to the room-door and howl dismally, till I forced him to lie at my feet; while now he seemed afraid of me and I of him, for he kept looking in my face, and whining, and then looking towards the door; and had I not struck him, he would have kept by it, tearing to get it open.

"The dim light of evening came at last, with the dread growing more and more upon me as the darkness increased. I dared not light a candle, — I don't know why; but I felt a sort of fear that I should see more than was really in the house, and besides, I should have had to go in the dark along the little passage to the kitchen, though I tried to persuade myself that it was on account of the dog, and a dread that he should get out of the room.

"And then came the night, windy and stormy, with the rain riding upon the gusts of wind, to be beaten against the window-panes. There was but little moon, and the clouds were heavy, and drove quickly along the sky; while, now, in the intervals of the gusts of wind, it seemed to me more and more that there was a voice calling me, as if from a great distance off, so that the sound came faintly upon my ear. I listened again and again, opening the door, and standing bareheaded in the rain; but I could hear nothing.

"Hours passed, and then I had made up my mind what to do. I locked the door of the room where I was sitting, went round to the back, so as not to pass through the passage, and locked the back-door. Then going back to the front-room, I found Hector whining, and tearing at the door to get to his mistress; and I called him away, but without effect; when, after a fierce battle, I dragged him out of the house to the shed, where I locked him in, after taking out a spade.

"The dog began to howl as soon as I had closed the door; but I knew that there was no one to hear him; so I went back to the house, closed and locked the door, and carried the spade to a spot I had determined on; after which I again returned to the house, hesitating at the door, however, half afraid to enter. Hector was quiet now, only scratching restlessly at the door of the shed.

"After waiting perhaps a quarter of an hour, passed in listening, I roused myself, and went in, drank furiously from the brandy I had in the closet; and then tearing open the inner door, I stooped, seized the body, which seemed like lead, and staggered with it out into the lane.

"I can't tell now how I got along, with the long low howl of the dog ringing in my ears, as he heard my heavy, staggering footsteps. I seemed, as I went on, to have the strength of ten men, and the fears of a hundred. The bramble tearing at my coat was some one staying me; the bole of a tree, some one watching over the hedge; every gust of wind bore cries of fancied pursuers; and, half-mad, I pressed on, reeling from side to side of the road, till I reached the gate which led to the path I had chosen; and after getting through, I was obliged to stay here and rest.

"Rest! What a word! Rest!—that which I was never to know again. I dared not place my dreadful burden upon the ground, but stood leaning on the gate for a few minutes, before I turned and pressed on along the narrow grass-grown path for a few yards, striking then into the great fir-wood, where the path was slippery with the fallen needles, and gave here and there, where there was a tuft of green moss, all bare. Trees everywhere, — tall straight fir-trees, like the pillars of a great temple, and close together, so that I had to thread my way carefully as I slowly climbed the rising ground, the darkness being at times so intense that I had to hold one hand stretched out in front, to prevent striking against some trunk.

"Up still, higher and higher, a long toilsome walk with so heavy a load, my feet slipping from under me as the ground sloped more, — the pine-needles making the path at times seem like glass; while once I tripped over a pine-stump, and fell heavily. But I was now close to where I had laid my spade, for I knew the ground well; and leaving my burden where it had fallen, I hurried to the spot I had fixed upon, — an open space where a few trees had been thinned out, — and then, seizing my spade, I carefully scraped the needles into a heap, ready to spread over the ground again, and then began to dig.

"At times there was such a lull of the storm, and all was so still, that the strokes of the spade echoed back to me, and then directly after I would stop, shivering, as the wind seemed to shout and wail amongst the tree-tops, roaring and hissing, and making branches creak and groan as they ground together. It was horrible; for the one word Murder, Murder! seemed to ring in my ears as though ten thousand voices shouted it; but I toiled on, digging furiously, throwing out spadeful after spadeful of earth, till I stood knee-deep in the black earth, making the heap at my side higher and higher.

"How the wind thundered in those fir-tops, and what a strange, ghastly gloom there seemed around! Now it would grow pitchy black, and the rain would come hissing and pattering down; then there would be a pale light steal through the tall trunks of the trees, so that I could see for some little distance round. At one of these times I turned cold, the sweat stood in a chilly dew upon my forehead, my hair was wet, and I dropped the spade, for there, in the strange gloom, was something white staring horribly at me; and then I saw it apparently steal away, and melt into the darkness amongst the trees.

"As soon as I could sufficiently recover myself, I seized the spade again, and dug on to deepen the rough hole I was making, when again my blood seemed to freeze as I saw the same white figure indistinctly in the dim distance, before I made out that it was Hector, seated now, as I could tell, where I had left the body, and howling most dismally.

"Relieved of my fears, I hurled a piece of earth at the dog, when he disappeared once more; and after a few more strokes of the spade, while trying the blade too strongly against a pine-root, the handle snapped in two.

"There was nothing else for it; so, tearing off, I ran back to fetch another, and found, as I expected, that the dog had broken the shed window, and leaped out; while upon once more reaching the pine-wood, I stopped short, for there came a dreadful cry from its depths, — a horrible, long-drawn, echoing cry, which was repeated twice before I knew it to be Hector, whom I found sitting by the body.

"Could I have reached him, I should have killed him with the spade I carried; but my approach drove him away, for he knew me, and would not come near, though I tried hard to get him within reach, calling him again and again.

"It all seems like a dream, a horrible nightmare, that night: the strange whisperings amongst the trees, the voices, the shouts, wails, shrieks, and cries, the rushing noises, the echoing sound of my spade, and the occasional lulls, when all was as still as death. But I deepened the hole, dragged in the body, covered it level with the surrounding soil, beat it down frantically, to hide my crime from the sight of men, and then laboriously scattered about the spare earth, before I again spread the pine-needles over the spot.

"Day was faintly beginning to break before I
